We entered the canton of Bern between Morat and Gumenen, and were immediately struck with the curious costume of the women. It is such that I should have supposed it greatly exaggerated if I had seen it only in a picture. The body of the gown, or bodice, if such it can be called, and the entire skirt, is black, or if it is not entirely black, it presents a small square of white upon the bosom, surrounded as it were by a deep black frame—the sleeve which issues from beneath it on either side is white and very full, giving them an appearance not very unlike that of a bishop in his lawn. I am aware of the temerity of the comparison, and yet I know not how to give you a better idea of the costume I am attempting to describe. The hair is suffered to grow to its full length, and is plaited into two tails, or queues, which are tied with a black riband, and literally reaches down to their heels. But the head has the oddest appearance. It is about half covered, and that at the back of it, with a black cap, from the edge of which springs a sort of ornamental trimming, which at a distance has the appearance of lace; but I handled one at Gumenen, and I found it nothing more nor less than black horse hair. This trimming rises perpendicularly from the cap to the extent of from three to six or seven inches, and looks like wings stretching from each side of the head, for it is so thrown back on the crown of the head, as not to be seen there in a front view. Now all this would have been well, (but certainly singular and grotesque enough to an English eye,) in a full dress or holiday suit: but to see women working in the fields—beggars in the streets, and little children that could scarcely walk alone, thus adorned, was truly ridiculous. Yet, this dress prevails throughout the whole of the canton; we scarcely saw a woman on the road, or at her cottage door, or in the streets of Bern, who was not so attired. The costumes of Switzerland are almost as uniform as the dress of a charity school. In every individual that you meet the cut and colour are the same, especially with the females, so that when you have seen one woman of the canton, you have seen all. This is the case, more or less, in every canton, and each has a costume of its own. At Bern we were furnished with complete sets of the Swiss costumes, represented in characteristic figures, by the pencil of M. Dinkel, a Swiss artist of great celebrity. He was represented to us by the vender of his productions as being now at the point of death, and one argument he employed to induce us to purchase, was, that his works would be greatly increased in value after his decease.

The approach to Bern is very pleasing; the country around is beautifully undulated and in the highest state of cultivation. The vicinity for a considerable distance indicated by its life and bustle, that we were approaching to a capital, and on entering the city by its beautiful trenches and noble gates, we found the streets crowded with people in their gayest attire—and filled with corn and cattle, and almost every article of commerce, it being market-day. It is a magnificent city, and next to Paris, incomparably the finest we have yet seen on the continent. The houses are all built of stone, with arcades in the principal streets, and rows of well furnished shops. The town is abundantly supplied with fountains, and streams of water flow through the centre of the streets, which are wide, in deep and broad channels cut for their reception. From the great influx of people the city had a very gay appearance. The expression, the costume, the language,—all was perfectly new. I was greatly interested in my perambulations through it. It seemed to exhibit society under another aspect.—It had not the refinement of Paris, nor the dulness of Geneva, but appeared like the capital of an active and flourishing state.

There are many noble edifices in Bern. The cathedral is a magnificent pile of gothic architecture, occupying a bold elevation above the Aar. It possesses a remarkably fine organ, of enormous size, stretching to nearly the whole breadth of the church. They were preparing the choir, no longer disgraced by the splendid paraphanalia of popish worship, for the meeting of the Swiss Diet.

In the city of Bern, I was shocked by a spectacle of human degradation and wretchedness, such as I had never witnessed before. I was, of course, aware of the practice that prevails in many parts of the continent, of chaining criminals, like beasts, to carts, which they drag along the streets, for the purpose of collecting the filth and rubbish which is swept up and thrown in by other criminals of lighter delinquency and less heavily ironed: here I saw it, and it was, indeed, a most repulsive and humiliating sight. No doubt the hulks at Woolwich would exhibit as shocking a spectacle; but then it is not as here, obtruded upon one's eyes in the heart of the city, and where the mind is little prepared for such an affecting lesson. But it is common to the Bernese, and does not, of course, excite the same emotions in their minds as in those of strangers. Men, and even women, are doomed to this degrading punishment for years, and sometimes for life. I should hope that the diffusion of knowledge, and the advance of liberal sentiment, would sooner or later induce all civilized states to review their criminal codes, and make such revisions as the experience of past ages, and the public voice seem to require.*

At our hotel in Bern we met with everything in the highest style of elegance and comfort, and I could only regret that we had but a few hours to devote to a place that might have occupied and interested us several days. We there changed our driver, and procured a smart spirited fellow, with a fine set of horses, who has got us over the ground at a rate very superior to that of the miserable drone we left behind.

I know not that I ever passed so fine a road as that by which we left Bern to proceed to Soleure. It turns abruptly to the left, and climbs a hill immediately on leaving the gates of the city, and passes between rows of trees, with a gentle slope on either hand, covered with the freshest verdure and as smooth as the finest lawn. The bird's-eye views of the city, which we obtained as we ascended, were extremely interesting. We saw it in its length and breadth surrounded by the Aar, and laying in full perspective at our feet. But a far nobler scene was unfolded to the south-east, where an immense chain of Alps appeared like the outer boundaries of some new creation, to which their dreadful precipices, inaccessible peaks, and summits of untrodden snow for ever barred the approach of man. The average height of this chain is, perhaps, about twelve thousand feet, and the forms of the mountains that compose it are wild and fantastic beyond imagination. The purity of the atmosphere gave them a distinctness of outline, such as is rarely enjoyed in our own country, and such as I once realized in the ascent of Ben Lomond. The beams of the retiring sun gilded their lofty pinnacles, and imparted to their masses of spotless snow a brightness that seemed to have more of heaven in it than earth. Oh! if terrestrial scenes can appear so lovely, what must that purity and lustre be, of which they are only the dim shadows and imperfect emblems!

We slept last night at Soleure, and left it at six this morning. While the carriage was getting ready, I stepped into two of the churches, which were close by our inn. They were performing divine worship in both, though at such an early hour, and one of them was nearly filled with people. The church of St. Ursus is esteemed the finest in Switzerland. Its architecture is Grecian, and the altar-pieces and ornaments are in the highest style of Popish magnificence. Soleure is watered by the Aar, and its neighbourhood is remarkably pleasant. The land is chiefly pasturage, and the meadows are extremely rich. No wonder that their cattle in this part of Switzerland should be so fine. I saw some oxen in the market-place at Bern equal to any I ever saw in Leicestershire, and that would have satisfied the greatest connoisseur in beef, had he been upon the search for his Christmas dinner.

Our first stage from Soleure was to Balstall. It would be ungrateful to pass this little village without notice, for there, at breakfast, we had the best bread we have met with since leaving England, and this I assure you was no small luxury. A few miles before reaching Birstall the road turns abruptly to the left, and traverses a rocky pass, at the head of which, crowning an enormous rock, stands the ruined castle of Kluss. Issuing from the pass, we entered a spacious valley, the hills gently rising to the right, clothed with forests of fir, and rocks towering abruptly to the left, to an amazing height. On the summit of one perpendicular crag, after passing Balstall, we observed the ruins of the castle of Falkenstein—and a few miles further, those of the castle of Wallenburg. These mouldering ruins too surely indicated what scenes in former ages were developed in these peaceful vales, when they were made to ring with the clangour of arms, and were deluged with blood.

We dined at the little town of Liechstall, a poor and insignificant place, yet we entered it by towers that had once been strong, and it appeared to be like most of the continental towns, completely walled. After dinner we strolled about the town, and penetrated into the shop of a calico printer, who was busy at his work. He could speak nothing but German himself, but he soon introduced his brother, who spoke very good English. He told us he was a mathematical and surgical instrument maker. Twenty years ago he left England, where he had worked some time. He said he was much better off then than he was now, for he had very little work at present. But, notwithstanding this, he loved his country. He spoke very highly of the English, and called his children to see the Messrs. Anglais. He observed, the town in which he lived was a poor place; and very aptly compared it to a court in London. I inquired into the state of religion and education amongst them. He said they were all Protestants. They had no Sunday-schools, but they had daily schools gratis, to which the poor were obliged to send their children. They have no branch of the Bible Society amongst them, but they are abundantly supplied with the holy scriptures from the society at Basle. The minister is very diligent in the discharge of his duty, and catechises the children when they have attained to the age of fifteen years.

About five miles from Liechstall, an abrupt turn of the road gave us the first view of the Rhine, with the dark woods of the Black Forest occupying the rising ground on its opposite bank, and forming, in that direction, the frontiers of the Austrian territory. I could not but behold with the deepest interest this noble and impetuous torrent, associated as it is with the most important scenes and revolutions in the history of Europe, and oftener, perhaps, than any other, disturbed by the thunder of war and dyed with blood.

The windows of our hotel look out upon the Rhine, and the river washes the walls of the house. The stream rushes past with astonishing rapidity. Here is a permanent bridge, built in part only of stone. It consists of fourteen arches, and is six hundred feet in length. In the strongest part of the current it is of wood, and over the piles are placed enormous mill-stones, to prevent their being torn up from their sockets and hurried down the stream. The river divides the city into two parts, forming the large and small town. The city is surrounded by walls and ramparts, and is capable, it is said, of containing one hundred thousand inhabitants. Its present population, however, is stated at only sixteen thousand. In 1431, it was forty thousand. There are no craft or pleasure boats upon the river, the rapidity of the current forbidding them. We have just seen a boat start that appeared ill able to stand the fury of such a torrent. It went at a terrific rate, and was soon out of sight. In these frail and crazy barks, however, travellers are sometimes conveyed to Strasburg, a distance of eighty miles, which they accomplish in fifteen hours. It appeared to me that the navigation was extremely perilous, for the river abounds with shoals and eddies,—the boat is of the rudest structure, composed of a few planks of deal, and often so rickety, that a man cannot stand erect in it, while it is navigated down the torrent by a single paddle.

There are some noble residences in Basle, which bespeak the opulence of their inhabitants: but the streets in general are narrow and intricate. The windows of the houses are for the most part defended by massive iron grating, which gives them the appearance of prisons, and throws an air of gloom over the whole place. We observed the same thing in other towns, but were peculiarly struck with it here. The cathedral is a venerable structure, but greatly disfigured by the red paint with which its whole exterior has been barbarously daubed. It will ever be remembered as the asylum in which the ashes of the great Erasmus repose. Behind the cathedral is a terrace commanding a noble prospect of the river, the city, and the adjacent country on the opposite bank of the Rhine.

---

* Perhaps I ought to qualify what I have written above, and I prefer doing it by a note, rather than by any alteration of the original passage. The closing remark, though excited by what I saw in Bern, is intended to apply not so much to any foreign systems of punishment as to our own. The sanguinary character of the British code, and the abuses that exist in the system of police and the economy of our prisons, are notorious evils, and it is to be feared, more adapted to promote and increase, than diminish crimes. With respect to the practice above described in Bern, I am aware that Howard, any many enlightened philanthropists approve it, for the male convicts at least; the spectacle, however, when first beheld by a stranger must strike him as barbarous and disgusting. These men might be usefully employed without converting the streets of the city into scenes of punishment, and compelling the innocent inhabitants to be spectators. America has unquestionably the advantage of us in her method of treating criminals; and there are few states in Europe that might not be essentially benefited by adopting some of her principles. I rejoice that this subject is at present occupying much of the public attention, and hope, that when prejudice is a little more subdued, good will result from all that has been said and written about it.

The library at Basle, is rich in the original manuscripts of the reformers; and connected with it is a suite of apartments, in which are preserved many original drawings and paintings of the famous Holbein, who was a native of this city, where may be traced the progress of his genius from the rudest efforts of his pencil to that perfection in the art, for which his name is so justly celebrated.

Basle is also the seat of an ancient university, connected, with which are some of the most illustrious names in literature and science; and no student in biblical criticism can fail to pronounce, amongst many others, that of a Wetstein and a Buxtorf, with grateful admiration.

The principal manufactures of Basle are ribands, stuffs, and paper. The Basilians claim the invention of the art of paper making and of printing as their own. Their claim to the honour of the last invention is, however, so slender, that the city of Basle is rarely mentioned in those controversies to which the subject has given rise. The only towns considered as having any right to contend for it are Mayence, Strasburg, and Harleim.

Basle is a protestant canton, and there is a great steadiness and sobriety amongst the people. Although remarkable for their love of liberty, they yet seem to be under the influence of an active and inquisitive police. The magistrates are extremely careful of the public comfort and the public morals, and, like the fathers of the state, forbid their children whatever is likely to injure either. We asked for white bread—the magistrates allowed nothing but brown, because of the failure of the last harvest. We asked for French or English newspapers—the magistrates did not allow any to enter the canton; we might read the German if we pleased. One of the party inquired if there was any theatre. No—was the reply—Government will allow no public amusement whatever since the last bad season, lest the people should spend that money upon shows and spectacles which they want for bread. It would be better for the people if all Governments had an equal regard to the welfare of their subjects!

LETTER XXIV.

Kehl.

My dear ———

We are detained at this place, a small village on the German side of the Rhine, opposite Strasburg, being too late in our arrival to enter the city this evening. The gates are always closed at nine o'clock, and no one is permitted to pass after that time. This is a novel circumstance to an Englishman, who would not very calmly endure being shut out of one of his own towns at such an early hour. We thank God that the days of the curfew are over with us, and that we know nothing of that insecure and perturbed state of things which renders such precautions necessary. But we are not in England, and must, therefore, quietly submit.

We crossed the Rhine yesterday morning by the bridge at Basle, passed through the little city, and at the distance of about three miles on the road, left the canton of Basle, and entered Germany by the territories of the Grand Duke of Baden. We had the Rhine on our left, and the Black Forest, covering majestic hills, at some distance on our right; while a rich and luxuriant landscape smiled at every step. From the brow of a hill, about twelve miles from Basle, we obtained a glorious view of the windings of the river—the extensive and fertile valley through which it meanders—the dark undulations of the forest—the towers and the spires of the city in the distance—and the whole line of Alps in the back ground, rising in hoary grandeur, and glittering in the beams of the noon-day sun.

Here we left the Rhine; the road takes a direction towards the Black Forest, and skirts the edge of it, all the way to Fribourg. The route to Vienna lies through the heart of this forest. It was formerly, and is still, much infested by wolves, and at certain periods, especially in the severity of winter, travelling through it is not altogether unaccompanied with danger. You may, perhaps, have heard of a remarkable instance of self-devotion, related of the servant of a German Baron, who was passing through this forest, and pursued by wolves. For awhile they kept ahead of their ravenous pursuers, but the servant perceiving them gaining ground, and assured at length that escape was utterly impossible, told the postilion to stop—commended his wife and children to his master's protection, and then calmly gave himself up to be devoured—thus saving the life of his master at the expense of his own.

Happily, however, we saw no wolves—and the only inconvenience we suffered, was a detention of some hours at a filthy post-house. The postilion and the horses were all in a hay-field, and the wary landlady, was sagacious enough not to send for them, till she had got the price of a dinner out of the pockets of her guests. This circumstance delayed our arrival in Fribourg three hours, and it was just dusk when we entered the town.

Fribourg is a fine old town, famous for its minster, and its university. The minster is a noble pile of gothic architecture, most highly wrought, and of fine proportion. The workmanship of the tower and steeple is exquisite. The church is said to be after the model of that at Strasburg, and one of the finest ecclesiastical edifices in Germany.

We took up our quarters at the Moor, and had reason to be well satisfied with the civility and intelligence of our landlord. His appearance, moreover, was very prepossessing to us citizens of London, for he had all the protuberance and self-complacent air of a perfect cit, and might have been transported in statu quo, to a Lord Mayor's feast, or a fishmonger's dinner, without any chance of his foreign extraction being discovered, if he but kept his own counsel, and simply addressed himself to the matter in hand.

He told us, that at the time of the invasion of France by the allied armies, nearly a million of men passed through Fribourg. At that time, a malignant fever raged in the town, and carried off from thirty to forty a day. Nevertheless, the Emperor Alexander visited the hospital in person: "as for me," said the landlord, shrugging up his shoulders with wonderful effect, "I did not dare to do it, for fear of catching the fever."

In the album of the hotel, we saw many illustrious names, and amongst others, that of Gustavus Adolphus, the ci-devant king of Sweden, who passed the 29th, 30th, and 31st of July, 1813, in that inn. The landlord assured us that the handwriting was his own.

We did not leave Fribourg till noon to-day, having met with interesting objects to detain us. Before breakfast we visited the cathedral. The gates were open, and many were engaged in their morning devotions before the several altars. The interior of the church is spacious and magnificent, and abounds with sculptures and paintings of the richest kind. We were particularly struck with a representation of the last supper, quite novel in its plan. In a small recess, or chapel, in one of the aisles of the church, an ordinary table is placed, covered with white linen, and the Redeemer and the twelve apostles are seated round it, in figures of marble, as large as life. The expression of the countenances is admirably given, especially that of John, who leans on the bosom of Christ—and Judas, who sits the last in the groupe, and whose hand grasps the bag. The whole has a very fine and imposing effect, and comes nearer to life than anything I have yet seen. This church is also very rich in painted glass.

We should have staid longer in the cathedral, but our walking about seemed to disturb the devotions of the devotees, and being warned to depart by the sour looks, and savage mutterings of a fierce old man, who appeared to be particularly annoyed by the presence of us heretics, in so holy a place, we deemed it prudent to take the hint.

From the cathedral we proceeded to the library. It contains about 70,000 volumes. It possesses no manuscripts, but many of the books are extremely rare and valuable, consisting chiefly of Polyglots—the Fathers—Editiones' principes of the classics, &c. &c. I observed the Polyglot of Cardinal Ximenes. This library belongs to the university, in which there are, at present, about four hundred students. These give a literary air to the town. I never saw so many young men, passing through the streets with books under their arms, as at Fribourg. There is, also, a very excellent collection of anatomical preparations, which we saw. The number is small, but the subjects are well preserved and judiciously arranged.

After breakfast we were gratified by a visit to the convent and the monastery. The convent is situated at the outskirts of the town. We were permitted to see the interior of it, and were highly pleased with the accomplished manners, and polite attention of the superior, who accompanied us through the apartments, and explained the economy of the institution. There are but twelve nuns at present in the convent, and three lay sisters; the latter perform the domestic duties of the house. Four of the nuns are employed in teaching a girl's school kept within the walls of the convent. The number of scholars is about four hundred; the labours of the nuns are entirely gratuitous. We visited the several classes, and the nuns to whose charge they were committed, with great readiness exhibited specimens of their work, which the ladies assured us did all the parties concerned the greatest credit. The rest of the sisters occupy themselves in needle-work. We were admitted to the cell of one. It was a neat and commodious chamber. The furniture of the room was simple, but sufficient, and I observed a small collection of books. The nun seemed very happy, and was busy at her work. The superior spoke excellent French, all the rest could speak no language but German. She could also understand a little English, a circumstance of which she informed us, with the utmost delicacy of feeling, lest, as she observed, we should make remarks we might not wish any but our own party to hear.

She told us that all the useless convents had been abolished by Joseph II., but that such religious establishments as rendered themselves serviceable to society were permitted to remain. We inquired by what means the institution was supported. She said they had funds, but they were so scanty, that they were obliged occasionally to solicit aid from government, which was readily granted them. She appeared much pleased when she discovered that we were English, and spoke very highly of our country. She asked how long we had been travelling, and observed, "it must be a fine thing to go abroad and see the world as you do,"—and yet there was nothing in her countenance that betrayed dissatisfaction with her calm and sequestered lot. On the contrary, there was an air of mild and placid cheerfulness about her, with an expression that indicated virtues and dispositions, that might sweeten a better state than that of celibacy and solitude.

She kindly showed us the chapel of the convent. It is remarkable for possessing the skeleton of one St. Felician, an early martyr of the church. It lies in a glass case over one of the altars, and is most splendidly arrayed in satin and velvet, adorned with jewels and lace. It is not easy to conceive what a curious figure a skeleton's head cuts, looking out from the midst of such finery. It affords, however, a striking emblem of that world, with its pleasures and allurements, which these nuns profess to have forsaken. Its external appearance is splendid and fascinating, but in reality it is all rottenness and deformity. As Henry Kirke White said of those academic honours, which he purchased with his life, we may truly say of the world, "It is a death's head, under a mask of beauty."

The bones of this famous martyr, who was a bishop, were presented to the convent. The apparel and decorations are the workmanship of the nuns. The lamp which was found burning in his sepulchre, is still unextinguished by his side. Near the altar of the saint, we observed many little arms and legs, and other members of the human body modelled in wax, and laid in rows upon shelves. We inquired the meaning of the collection. The nun informed us that they were offerings to the saint, in consequence of miraculous cures effected by his mediation. If any person had a disease in the arm or leg, &c. he brought the representation of the diseased limb in wax, and presented it at the shrine of the saint, who interceded for him, and he was immediately healed. I thought, from her manner of telling the story, that the nun herself had not much faith in it. Indeed, she appeared to be a woman of an enlarged and liberal mind, whose heart would freely open to the light of truth, if from any quarter it should beam upon her. We left her with regret, and shall long remember the nun of Fribourg—the politeness of her manners—the soundness of her understanding, and the sweetness of her disposition.

From the convent we proceeded to the monastery of the Capuchin friars. The monks are all old men, and with their bald heads, long beards, sandalled feet, and coarse brown coat and cowl, bound round the middle with a piece of rope, from which was suspended the rosary and cross, were to me, who had never seen a monk before, most venerable and interesting objects. One of them only could speak French. He told us that he took the habit of a monk when but twenty years old, and though he is now eighty-three, yet he still appeared a strong and hearty man, and spoke with all the fire and energy of youth. "At the time of the French revolution," said he, "when this country was part of Alsace, they wanted to abolish this monastery, and offered to provide for the monks if they would abjure the monastic life and become curates. But, no," said the old man, the fire of indignation flashing from his eyes, "I disdained the proposal—I had taken the vow to my God, and I resolved to perform it—preferring to live in poverty and upon alms, rather than forsake the life to which I was devoted." Of what use to society he had been during his long life, however, he did not tell us; neither did he say wherein consisted the wisdom or the piety of taking such a vow. He told us that they were not permitted to receive any new fathers into the monastery, that they were left to die off, and that their number was already reduced to six. He said that the only provision found them was water and wood, for the rest they subsisted upon charity. We had observed, however, a very good kitchen, and, on our entrance into the monastery, had been introduced into a spacious and well furnished dining-room, both of which indicated better fare than bread and water, as that with which, occasionally at least, these holy fathers were regaled.

The conversation had hitherto been carried on in the garden. We at length expressed a desire to see the interior of one of their cells—but this they informed us could not be allowed. "And why," said the monk, "should you wish to see so forlorn a place; the cell is but poorly furnished, and scarcely able to contain four persons at a time." One of my fair companions, however, so completely insinuated herself into the good graces of another of the old men, that he was induced to break through the rule and let us into his. It was, as he described, a poor and small apartment. A coarse bed occupied one half—a desk, a chair, and two shelves of books the rest. The books were chiefly scholastic divinity. The monk showed us what he called his consciones, of which he had several bundles; he appeared to have been employed when we interrupted him, in adding to the stock. The writing materials, and a half-finished essay were on his desk. There was no fire-place in the cell.

In the chapel of the monastery they showed us a great wonder. It was a figure of Jesus Christ lying on the lap of the Virgin Mary, with his wounds gaping and bleeding, carved in wood. This figure they assured us was once animated and used to move. It has been still enough of late, however, according to their own account, except at the time of the revolution, when its head was knocked off by a bomb-shell, which they still preserve, and the Virgin Mary got a wound in her cheek from a pistol shot. They had put on the head again and healed the cheek, but not before they had an exact drawing taken of the headless Saviour and the wounded Virgin.

We have passed by many vineyards to-day, in which the vines were much higher than in France or Switzerland; we also observed some Indian corn, which is cultivated in this country with success.

LETTER XXV.

Mayence.

My dear ———

Immediately on leaving Kehl, we crossed the Rhine by the bridge of boats, and again entered France. We passed on the left the beautiful monument erected by Napoleon to the memory of General Dessaix. It is the work of Ohmacht, a German artist, from a design by Weinbrenner. At Strasburg, which is about three miles from the banks of the Rhine, the principal object of attraction is the cathedral. It is certainly one of the finest buildings the continent can boast. Its workmanship is most exquisite, and its whole appearance truly sublime. The stone is of a dark red, which gives it a sombre character. The front is exceedingly magnificent, notwithstanding the circumstance that it was designed for two spires and possesses only one. The spire is the highest in Europe, being four hundred and ninety-four feet from the ground: yet it is extremely light and elegant. Mr. H——, Mrs. F——, and myself, ascended within eighteen feet of the highest accessible point—the other eighteen feet of honour we did not think it wise to purchase at the peril of our lives; for, from the place where we stood, the steps to the highest pinnacle are entirely undefended, that it must be madness in one, not well practised in the art of climbing, to attempt ascending them on the thin pinnacle of a spire, then nearly five hundred feet from the earth. The ascent to the point we reached was extremely difficult, and not, I think, altogether without danger, for the spire is composed entirely of open work, wrought in stone, bound together with bars of iron; and we had to squeeze through a narrow cork-screw kind of staircase, that winds round the gothic pinnacles, which rise almost like bundles of reeds, gradually lengthened towards the centre to form the spire. The descent was by far the most formidable part of this expedition, and I was not a little pleased and thankful when it was safely accomplished.

My ambition led me to the top of the highest spire in Europe, but, like most elevations, it was giddy and hazardous; and in this instance, as in many others, by no means repaid the toil of reaching it, for the view into the street below is too terrific to impart anything like pleasure, while that of the surrounding country is flat and uninteresting, except to the north, and not any more extensive than what is obtained from the leads of the tower beneath, which is not more than half its height, and the ascent to which is perfectly safe and easy. The principal objects are the windings of the Rhine and the buildings of the city. At the time of the passing of the allied armies through the continent there were sixty thousand men in the neighbourhood of Strasburg, thirty in Kehl, and thirty in the plains in the vicinity of the town.

On the leads above mentioned, men constantly live, whose business it is to keep a watch over the city, and to give the earliest alarm of fire. They are furnished with long poles, from which a flag is hung by day and a lantern by night. So soon as a fire is seen, they sound the tocsin and rouse the inhabitants, whose eyes are immediately turned towards the tower of the church, and the direction in which the flag or lantern is pointed, and the quantity of the pole which is put out, shows them at once the direction and distance of the fire. To secure the watchfulness of the men, they are compelled to strike the quarters upon the clock, which of course keeps one of them constantly awake, and on the look out. These excellent precautions seem to have arisen from the circumstance that the interior of the cathedral was almost entirely consumed by fire about fifty years ago.

The interior of the cathedral is spacious and plain, but exceedingly rich in painted glass. It is surrounded by little chapels. Service was performed at the high altar, and at several of the inferior altars, and there were many people engaged in their devotions. The organ is remarkably elegant, and curiously placed over one of the aisles.

From the cathedral we went to the church of St. Thomas, to see the monument erected by Louis XV. to the memory of the great General, Count Saxe. It is a noble effort of the art of sculpture. The General is represented descending to his tomb, Death is holding the lid of it open for his reception—while the Genius of France, in the utmost agony, puts forth one hand to arrest the Count, and with the other she strives to thrust away Death. Hercules stands leaning on the other end of the sarcophagus, with an expression of the deepest, but most dignified grief.

From Strasburg we proceeded along a flat and insipid, though highly cultivated country, to Lauterbourgh, on leaving which we entered a portion of the Bavarian territories. This was indicated by the demand for our passports, and the change of the postilion's costume to light blue. We now drove for several miles through a fine wood, the openings in which towards the Rhine gave us occasional views of the high lands on the opposite bank of the river, though we saw not the river itself, until we reached the vicinity of Spire.

All along from Strasburg to Spire the harvest looked well, though in some places a little beat down by the heavy thunder showers with which we have recently been visited. The potato, the Indian corn, and the vine, each attracted our attention as we passed along. They seem to flourish exceedingly in this genial clime. We spent a sabbath at Spire in retirement and quietude. We repaired to the churches, but service was performed in the German language, of which none of us, I believe, understood enough to derive any edification from what we heard. I was present in the afternoon at one of the churches, when the minister catechised the children, and was much pleased with the seriousness and earnestness of his manner. He appeared to be deeply interested in the improvement of his catechumens, and to take great pains in their instruction. They read a chapter of the new testament, each one reading a verse, and the question of the minister arose out of the verses as they were read. This was in a Lutheran church. We afterwards went to the Catholic chapel, and there we heard a country congregation, not chant, but bawl the vespers. There was more of the ludicrous in the scene than I could endure, and I quickly left them, and returned to the solitude of my own apartment to reflect on the happy sabbath you were spending in England —that land of sabbaths and of Bibles—dearer to me than ever —since I have learned the value of its privileges by their loss! At Spire there is little to interest a stranger, except an old cathedral of curious architecture, now fast sinking to decay.

On leaving Spire, we passed through a flat, but luxuriant country to Manheim. There we crossed the Rhine by a bridge of boats, and entered again the territories of the Grand Duke of Baden. At Manheim is a palace of the Grand Duke, and from the Bavarian side of the Rhine, as we approached the city, we had a fine view of the chateau, the gardens of which are laid out in the style of an English pleasure-ground, and occupy a space of many acres between the back front of the palace and the river. Manheim is a very fine city. Its streets are wide, and cross each other at right angles. The houses are all white and clean in their appearance, being built either of stone, or covered with a composition imitating it. The style of building is extremely good; the streets are clean, and the city throughout had a light and cheerful appearance. We found excellent quarters, great civility, and a good English breakfast, at the good English sign, "Le mouton."

After breakfast we walked to see the chateau and its gardens. The gardens are extensive and well laid out. The chateau is an immense pile of building, chiefly of a red kind of stone, intermixed with a whiter sort, which, when near, has by no means a pleasing effect. The palace is not very unlike that of Hampton court in its external appearance. The interior is very magnificent: but with the exception of a suite of rooms fitted up in the modern style for the reception of the Duke on his late marriage, is much neglected, and seems bordering at least upon decay,—while the rotten window frames in the principal front, and the stillness and solitude that reign in the grass-grown courts, give it an air of desolation and gloom. The apartments prepared for the Duke and Duchess on their marriage are, however, furnished with more taste and elegance than we have witnessed in any palace on the continent—and the state bed, which was the bridal couch, is the most costly and beautiful piece of workmanship that can be conceived. The whole of the furniture is white satin and muslin, most delicately embroidered with flowers. The state apartments beneath are fine, and the ballroom, which is lined with the richest marble, particularly so. There are some good paintings, by the best masters, in the picture gallery,—Rubens, Raphael, Teniers, Poussin, Titian, &c. &c.—and casts from the most celebrated antiques, in the chambers appropriated to models—the Venus, Laocoon, and Apollo are there. There is also a small collection of choice engravings. We had not time to see the ci-devant church of the Jesuits, which is said to be well worthy the traveller's attention.

Leaving Manheim, we crossed the Necker, which empties itself into the Rhine at Manheim, by another bridge of boats, and passing along a very heavy road of deep sand for some miles, came up with the fertile hills, which run along this side of the Rhine, at the distance of a few miles from the river, and entered on the beautiful tract of country, called the Bergstrasse, which is said to be the richest and most picturesque in Germany. We passed through Weinheim, and left Heidelburgh on our right. For many miles the road lay along the foot of hills clothed almost to their summits with luxuriant vineyards, and crowned with forests, from the midst of which, here and there, ruined castles were seen to emerge in gloomy grandeur. On the left was a level country, rich in corn-fields and orchards, stretching to the Rhine, and bounded on the line of the horizon, with the extensive forests which skirt the banks of that river.

About five P. M. we arrived at Darmstadt, the capital and residence of the Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, whose dominions we entered immediately on leaving Baden.

Darmstadt is a small but elegant city. It appears to be in its infancy, and has very much the air of a fashionable watering place in England. The houses too are all of stone, and in a beautiful style of architecture. The high street leads from the chateau through the centre of the city, and is terminated by a fine avenue of trees in a park, to which it opens. The chateau is a spacious and elegant building. We had not time to view the interior.

Leaving Darmstadt, we passed over extensive plains of corn, skirted by distant woods, and through several villages, that seemed the abodes of peace and comfort, and within a mile or two of Frankfort, rose through the midst of a forest of stately trees to the brow of a hill, whence the busy scenes of the city, and the beauties of the surrounding country, dimly met the eye amid the gloom of the twilight.

Frankfort is at present restored to its pristine state of independence. Buonaparte gave to its citizens a Grand Duke; but they have got rid of him, and are now a free city, governed by a Burgomaster of their own choosing, and in possession of the liberties their ancestors enjoyed.

Frankfort is a large, irregularly built town, seated on the Mein, extremely populous and busy—the population is about fifty thousand souls. It is, perhaps, the chief commercial city on the continent, and merchants from all parts of Europe and Asia send agents to transact business at its annual fair. The cathedral is only interesting from its antiquity, its monuments, and the circumstance that the Emperors of Germany used to be crowned in it. Otherwise it has no attractions. It is mean as a building, very dirty, and much neglected in the interior—while externally, it is surrounded by shops and shambles, by which it is completely hidden and disgraced. Many of the houses are spacious, and have the appearance of the abodes of wealthy merchants.—There are great multitudes of Jews in this city.* I had the good fortune in my rambles to find out the Rag-fair of the place.

A very interesting ceremony took place in Frankfort on the evening of our arrival. The first cart laden with the produce of the present harvest, and adorned with garlands, entered the city, preceded by the children of the different schools singing hymns. On its arrival before the principal Lutheran church, the minister came out and delivered an appropriate discourse, calculated to excite the gratitude of the people to Him who had crowned the year with his goodness. They seem to have suffered more severely from the failure of the last harvest, on the continent, than we did in England.

At Frankfort is the Bibliothèque du Conseil au Roemer, a library which contains 120,000 vols. and a great number of MSS. and early printed books. There are also many private collections of books, pictures, antiques, coins, insects, &c. well worth the attention of the curious, but which we had not time to see. A Bible Society was instituted there last year.

Not far from Frankfort we crossed the boundary line of that free state, which includes a few villages round the city, and entered the territories of the Grand Duke of Nassau. The first place we passed was Hochheim—where the famous wine well known by the name of hock, is made. The vines grow upon an eminence near the Mein, which flows by the village. From thence the country was flat and insipid, till a long and gentle ascent brought us to the brow of a hill, and gave us a grand view of the venerable towers of Mayence, with the windings of the Rhine and the Mein. The latter river empties its waters into the Rhine before the walls of Mayence.

We passed through the garrison of Cassel, opposite to Mayence, and had the honour to be received by the military with presented arms and the beating of drums. An honour you will say quite out of my way. You are right—I ought not to have said we—the honour was intended for another in whose society I have the honour to travel.

LETTER XXVI.

Cologne.

My dear ———

We embarked yesterday morning on board a boat, or packet, which is here called a coche d'eau, and sailed, or rather floated down the Rhine to this place. The river runs at the rate of six miles an hour. But before I leave Mayence I must say something about that ancient, and, on many accounts interesting city.

Mayence was formerly the first electorate of the German empire. It was also an archbishopric, and the archbishop and the elector were the same person. It was the privilege of the electors of Mayence to crown the emperors. It is now a bishopric simply, and the capital of Mont-Tonnerre. It was a Roman station, and the first town was built by Drusus Germanicus (Mogontiacum). One of the archbishops was Boniface, our countryman.—His monument is in the cathedral.

The cathedral, called "Le Dôme," is a most venerable pile, and is remarkably rich in ancient monuments; amongst others it contains the tomb of Fastrada, wife of Charlemagne. Its architecture is plain.

We were much interested with the man who showed us the cathedral. He was a Tyrolese, and had borne a commission in the army of France. He told us that he was not always poor, but he had lost his all in the revolution. He said he was at the taking of Corsica. The family of Buonaparte, including young Napoleon, then a boy, fell into his hands, and was carried by him into France. He told us that he had saved the life of the two sons of the Duke of Condé, and twice he had saved the life of the Bishop of Mayence, who was deposed at the period of the revolution, but he was now restored by the pope to his ecclesiastical functions and dignity. The old man spoke of him with the greatest feeling—almost with tears.

The collegiate church of St. Stephen is a very ancient edifice. It stands upon an elevated site. We ascended to the top of its tower, and enjoyed a fine view of the city, the opposite fort of Cassel, the Rhine, the Mein, and the surrounding country.

It was in this city that the art of printing with metal types was invented in the fifteenth century. The house in which the first press was established was not long since standing in the street of the Cordonniers. At present, however, it is entirely destroyed. We stood upon its ruins, and took a relic from its foundation. The French, with their characteristic levity of disposition, began to build a theatre upon the spot. A few pillars in part erected are standing, the monuments of their indifference and folly. Our guide at the cathedral expressed his opinion of the French in rather strong terms: he said the Germans at Mayence hated the French as they hate the devil! How much that is, however, I do not pretend to say.

There are some interesting Roman antiquities in this place. We saw one which is on the ramparts. It is a solitary tower, the remains of a fortification built by Drusus. There are also the ruins of a Roman aqueduct in the neighbourhood, which we saw from the top of St. Stephen's.

There is in Mayence a gallery of paintings, and a library of ninety thousand volumes. In the library are preserved some relics taken from the house in which printing was invented, and illustrative of the earliest efforts of that art.

The voyage usually made by travellers down the Rhine, commences at Mayence and terminates at Cologne. Coblence is exactly half way. About four miles from Mayence, at Biberic, on the right bank of the river, is the noble palace of the Grand Duke of Nassau. It is close on the water's edge, and has a delightful garden. Not long after leaving the chateau, the Grand Duke passed us in his state barge. About twenty miles from Mayence, at Bingen, on the left bank of the river, the Nahe empties itself into the Rhine, and forms, in that direction, the boundary of the newly-acquired Prussian territories. Thence all on the left as far as Cologne, is Prussia. From Bingen the scenery of the Rhine is extremely grand and romantic. The river, broad and rapid, winds round the bases of abrupt and lofty mountains. At every turn you seem to be enclosed by the hills on the bosom of a fresh lake, and each, as it rapidly succeeds the other, has its own peculiar features of majesty and beauty. Towns and cities, venerable for their antiquity, and peaceful villages and hamlets, skirt its banks. Almost every town you pass has its ruined castle, frowning on a proud eminence above it—embosomed in delicious woods, or seated on the rugged brow of some projecting rock. Desolated abbeys and cathedrals, the remains of the purest age of gothic architecture, are profusely scattered over the varied scene—and it requires, amid such interesting relics, no great effort of the imagination, to conceive the stream as you pass along, haunted by the heroes and the ecclesiastics of former times.

We dined yesterday at Caub, a village on the right bank of the river. While we were at dinner, a poor half-starved dog came in to take what chance or compassion might throw in his way. Our pity soon became his advocate, and a plate plentifully supplied with bones and bread was the result of its pleading in his behalf. The door of the room was open, and in the course of the meal, turning that way, I observed a poor meagre, ragged boy looking wistfully at the bones which the dog was rapidly devouring. I never saw the intense anxiety of hunger so depicted in a human countenance before—or met with such an illustration of the feelings of the prodigal, who would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat. The look was eloquent—who could resist its power. I beckoned him into the room, and put into his eager hand a lump of bread and a mutton chop. He was leaving the room, when an old man, who witnessed our bounty to the lad, rushed in. At his appearance I put out my arm to repel his solicitation, crying out, we shall have all the town to dine if we go on at this rate. The poor old man immediately turned away—he made no complaint he uttered no exclamation—but I could see the pangs of hunger in his countenance, and the tear started in his eye. This was more than I could bear—and touched to the very heart, I tasted an exquisite luxury in seeing this poor wretch depart with the smile of gratitude upon his lips.

* There are about ten thousand Jews in Frankfort. Their residence was formerly restricted to a particular part of the town, which was enclosed within walls, so that they could at any time be imprisoned in their own dwellings by locking the gates. So thickly were they then crowded together, that in seven houses which happened to be burnt down, there were found to have dwelt twelve hundred individuals. The established religion is Lutheran; but toleration has been very slow in its progress in Frankfort. Not more than twenty-five years ago, the Calvinists were obliged to go to a village on the opposite side of the Mein to enjoy public worship in tranquillity. They have now two handsome places of worship within the city.

We disembarked at Coblence about seven in the evening. Coblence is at present under the Prussian government. It formerly belonged to Trêves, and was annexed by Bonaparte to France. The government of Prussia is entirely military, which does not exactly suit the taste of the people. Every man, whatever be his rank, is obliged to serve one year in the army. It is an important place, and the king is strengthening its fortifications. On the opposite rock, which rises almost perpendicularly from the Rhine to the height of eight hundred feet, is the celebrated fortress of Ehrenbreitstein. The view from it is considered the finest on the banks of the Rhine. The connexion with that side of the river is by a flying bridge.

The population of Coblence is about ten thousand. It has no buildings or institutions particularly worthy of attention, and no manufactory, but one of Japan ware. From the failure of the last harvest, the sufferings of the people here were very great. The landlord of our inn, (the black eagle,) a most intelligent and obliging man, and who spoke English remarkably well—mentioned a district in the mountains, where the people lived during the whole winter upon nothing but frozen potatoes; and of these they had but a scanty pittance, as the greater part of the crop was never got, being buried in the snow. The poor were relieved by the bounty of the rich. The Prussian General Gneisenau, whom he called Blucher's head, from the circumstance that he laid the plans which Blucher executed, was then commanding in Coblence, and he told us, to the honour of the general, that at that time he had a service of plate just arrived from Paris, which he immediately consecrated to the relief of the distressed.* Labour is very cheap, a franc and a half per day, is the ordinary wages.

The people here are Catholic. Education is general. The schools are obliged to educate the children of the poor. gratis; so that there are very few who cannot read and write.

We embarked again upon the Rhine, at Coblence, this morning at seven o'clock, and landed here about half past six this evening. We took our provisions with us on board the boat, in consequence of which we experienced no delay. The Rhine was by no means so interesting to-day as yesterday. The scenery is less bold and romantic, and, at Bon, two-thirds of the distance from Coblence, we lost the hills altogether, and the country became flat, and not a little insipid after the grand features we had left behind. From Coblence, the reaches of the river became longer and more expanded—the islands more numerous, and the hills on either side more fertile and luxuriant. Before reaching Bon, we passed the seven mountains, and particularly marked the ruins of the castle of Drachenfels, that crown the nearest and most abrupt of the seven, which rises almost perpendicularly from the water's edge to the height of about fifteen hundred feet. This rock is almost entirely bare and very rugged—the rest are beautifully adorned with wood, and some of them are considerably higher. There are many curious and interesting traditions amongst the people in the neighbourhood, respecting these ruined castles of the Rhine. Some of them are related in the guide which we have with us, and none are more interesting than that of Drachenfels.

The view of Cologne from the Rhine is very imposing from its numerous spires and public edifices. In its bay you have the first sight of any thing like shipping and commerce. It also has a flying bridge like Coblence. It is a place of great antiquity, and is the oppidum ubiorum of the Romans. In more modern times it was one of the first cities in Germany, but it is now under the government of Prussia, and is fallen much into decay. Though it stands upon eight times as much ground as Coblence, it has but four times its number of inhabitants—there are eight thousand eight hundred houses. There are at present manufactories of ribands, lace, and stockings.

The antiquities of Cologne are many and interesting. The cathedral, called the Dôme, is in an unfinished state, but as far as it is built, it is a most sublime structure—and if it should ever be completed, according to the original plan, it will unquestionably be one of the noblest edifices in Europe; and perhaps the largest and most stately of its cathedrals. It is in truth, as our guide calls it—Un des plus beaux morceaux de l'ancienne architecture Allemande. Its foundations were laid in 1248, by Archbishop Conrad, of Hochstaden. The nave is supported by a quadruple collonnade of one hundred columns. These columns are immense, yet their appearance is light and elegant. The chancel is complete and used for worship. It is fitted up in the richest style, and hung with tapestry. Its altar is most splendid, and it has a great profusion of painted glass in its windows. The roof is immensely high, and suggests to the beholder what, when completed, must be the elevation of the towers to bear any proportion to such a roof. The towers were to have been five hundred feet high. One, however, is not more than twenty-one from the ground, and the other not half the intended elevation. The monuments in the choir are innumerable and most magnificent.

There is a library connected with the cathedral, and a chamber, called the chambre d'or, which contains many sacred utensils and sacerdotal garments of immense value, which were saved from the ruin of the revolution, and restored to the church in 1804.

The church of St. Mary, or Capitole, is not less remarkable than the Dôme. It was in the chapitre of this church that the unfortunate Maria de Medicis, wife of Henry IV. and mother of Louis XIII. ended her days in misery, after having been banished from France by the intrigues of Richelieu.

In the church of the Minorites, is the tomb of the celebrated Duns Scotus: the monks possess his MSS. to the amount of fourteen volumes folio.

Indeed, there would be no end to putting down the churches that are and have been in this city. At one period there were no less than two hundred and twelve.

LETTER XXVII.

Aix la Chapelle.

My dear ——

Before leaving Cologne, we repaired to the church of St. Pierre, to see the celebrated painting of the martyrdom of St. Peter, over the altar. It is esteemed one of the finest works of Rubens, and was painted by that great master, as a present to his parish church; for in this parish he was born, and in this church he was baptized. It is a sublime effort of the pencil. I am no connoisseur; but I must confess that I never experienced such emotions at the sight of a picture before. The writhing of the body in agony; the distention of every muscle; the anguish of the countenance; the nerve of the executioner, who is about to nail the last limb (the left arm) to the cross; are all so forcibly depicted, that the illusion is too much for a spectator of sensibility, and you soon begin to feel as though it were the reality upon which you gaze. This picture was taken by Bonaparte to swell the treasures of the Louvre. It has been restored to its place about fourteen months. On the back of the frame, which turns upon a pivot, another canvass is stretched, upon which a copy is painted, that usually appears at the altar-piece, and many persons seeing this, go away with the impression that they have beheld the original. The original, however, is carefully concealed from injury by folding doors, and is only unlocked and turned to the spectator when expressly desired.

In viewing this picture I was astonished at one circumstance, namely, the composure with which the young man who exhibited it brought us up to the high altar, and removed the sacred articles from it, that he might turn round the picture, although divine service was performing, and a priest officiating at an inferior altar close at his elbow. And all this for heretics, too! But it was for money—the oil which consecrates and hallows every thing!

From the church we went to look at the house in which Rubens was born. There are no paintings of the artist in it, nor are there any of his descendants in the city. There are some paintings of Le Brun in the house, which are said to be very fine.

From thence we again repaired to the cathedral, to view the paintings in a better light than the preceding evening afforded. There is one enclosed in folding doors richly gilt, very ancient, and certainly finely executed for its age. It is a representation of St. Ursula and her nuns, the Virgin and her Child, &c. and the Society de Mori. The painter was Phillipe Kolf, in 1411.

* I rejoice to add that the king of Prussia has since rewarded the benevolent general, by a present of another service of plate, more valuable than that which he so generously devoted.

But the most wonderful exhibition this church contains is that of the mausoleum of the wise men, whom they call three in number and kings in dignity, who came to pay their homage at the feet of the infant Jesus. Their bones were presented, according to our guide, by Frederic I. of the house of Hohenstaufen, to the Archbishop of Cologne, by whose care they were adorned with crowns and various ornaments, studded with gems, cameos, and divers precious stones, and deposited in a chest of massive silver, gilt. The sanctity of these relics, however, did not protect the shrine from sacrilege at the time of the French revolution, at which period it lost much of its value. But by the zeal and piety of the good people at Cologne, it is restored to the appearance, at least, of its former splendour; and if some of the jewels are glass, and some of its cameos modern devices, it looks nearly as well and is quite as useful as before. But the most remarkable, and, to a reflecting mind, the most affecting circumstance connected with these relics is, the adoration that is paid them. There are actually litanies composed in Latin respecting them, abounding in prayers addressed expressly to them; and amongst others, a petition, which, if the intercessions of these saints had much avail, would ever have withheld from us the privilege of approaching their shrine, for it asks them to "keep all pertinacious heretics from that province." These litanies are sold near the cathedral, and warranted to have touched the holy relics, and whosoever recites them devoutly in the church, is promised three hundred and nine days of indulgence. Recited out of the church they have far less virtue, for such an act of devotion entitles to no more than two hundred and three. There are also engravings of the kings which have touched the sacred bones, and one of these I certainly should have purchased, for they cure head-aches, and perform sundry other desirable services.

From thence we went to the church of the Minorites, and saw the tomb of the famous Duns Scotus; it is nothing but a mass of stone, without any inscription or date. It is behind the high altar. Here, too, they showed us, carefully preserved in a glass case, the remains of an infant, which they said was one of the children whom Herod killed in the hope of destroying Christ. The skeleton seems to be entire. It is covered with a sort of cloth, almost consumed by age, and studded with stones.

On leaving Cologne we travelled through a flat and sandy country, to this place, forty-five miles, where we did not arrive till ten o'clock at night. The best hotel in the place was full, and we were obliged to put up at one of a very inferior quality.

This morning we have visited the cathedral. The centre is octagonal, surrounded by an aisle, whose pillars support a corresponding gallery above. This church is interesting from the circumstance that it was built, all but the choir, by Charlemagne, and possesses the remains of that monarch. His body was embalmed immediately after his decease, and entombed sitting upright in a stone chair. It was discovered, about three hundred years afterwards, by Frederic Barbarossa, who caused the body to be interred in a vault in the centre of this church, and the chair, together with the steps which led down into the monarch's tomb, to be placed in the gallery above. In that chair, from the period of its removal to the time of Charles V., the Emperors of Germany were crowned. On these occasions the railing of the gallery was removed, and a flight of steps prepared from the area below to the imperial chair. Of course we did ourselves the honour of sitting in so illustrious a seat.

The ornamental parts of the church are comparatively of modern date. They were very splendid, but the major part were removed or destroyed at the time of Robespierre, particularly the thirty-nine pillars which surrounded the dome. The bronze railing was destined for the same fate, and was actually packed up in order to be removed to Paris, but it never went, and has since been replaced. The lead on the roof, however, was melted down for balls and shot for the revolutionary armies. We were shown, in a small chapel in the gallery, a fine painting by Rubens; the subject is, the taking down from the cross. They had another, but it was destroyed in the time of the general ruin. The chair of Charlemagne was formerly covered with gold. At the revolution, anticipating that it would soon become a prey to the destroyers, they had the wisdom to strip it off and conceal it, and the disappointment occasioned by this circumstance, induced the soldiers to pour their heaviest vengeance on the edifice. The tomb of Charlemagne is nothing more than a plain stone let into the floor, with the name, "Carolo Magno," in letters of brass.

All this was interesting, but the cream of the antiquities yet remained. We were conducted to the vestry, or robing place of the priests, where a young man, whose province it is to expose these wonders to the gaze of the credulous, threw open the curiously painted doors of an immense recess, when in an instant we were dazzled with a profusion of gold and precious stones, wrought into various forms, to contain or emblazon the precious and sacred relics hereafter to be enumerated. First, then, a sort of tomb, worked after the gothic, in silver, gilt, and containing the garments of Charlemagne: then, another of similar metal and workmanship, containing the garments of the Virgin Mary. These tombs were extremely splendid, and the workmanship was most exquisite: then followed a bone of Charlemagne's arm, incased in an immense arm and hand, of silver, gilt: a piece of the real cross, enclosed in a silver cross, which was always worn by Charlemagne. They informed us that he brought the piece of the cross himself from Jerusalem, and gave it to this church. The hunting horn of Charlemagne, and the sceptre of that monarch, solid silver, an immense length, but the exact length of his arm.

By all this our curiosity and credulity were pretty much exercised; but we were struck perfectly dumb when we saw all these glories of antiquity utterly eclipsed by their successors. We were shown—1. The girdle of Jesus Christ, brought by Charlemagne from Jerusalem, and with that monarch's seal annexed to it. 2. The girdle of the Virgin Mary, derived from the same quarter. 3. A bone of the Virgin Mary's father. 4. A bit of the cord with which Jesus Christ was bound when he was scourged. 5. A prickle from the crown of thorns. 6. A bit of the sponge with which they supplied the vinegar. 7. A bit of one of the nails by which he was fastened to the cross. And 8thly and lastly, some of the sweat which fell from him in the garden of Gethsemane. To this may be added, a link of the chain with which Peter was chained at Rome; a bit of the bone of Simeon's arm, with which he embraced the infant Jesus; a rib of St. Stephen, and a tooth of St. Thomas!!!

All these things we saw, and all these wonders were gravely exhibited and propounded to us, for our edification and pious astonishment, by a worthy priest, who, with many more, was robing in the room for high mass, but who occasionally stepped aside to explain and narrate the story of these unparalleled wonders.

To be sure, this beat every thing; and after this I am prepared to believe whatever shall be related of the gross, the degrading, the besotting superstition of this deluded people. Yet, there was a Frenchman, a gentlemanly looking man, with an order of knighthood on his coat, who drank it all in with avidity, and seemed to relish and digest the whole. For my part, I thought of the sailor, who, after his messmates had told some wonderful stories of what had been found in the bellies of whales and sharks, and such monsters, determined to outstrip them all, said, he had once been present at the catching of a fish, out of whose belly, when opened, there came a ship, with all its masts and rigging, and the whole of the crew!

The scene in the room was scarcely less curious than these wonders themselves. There were at least half a dozen priests at one time either robing or praying. I observed that the priest kissed every garment before he put it on. Nor did those who were praying seem at all interrupted by the robing of their colleagues, or the bustle of the exhibition of the relics; but every now and then they stopped in their devotions to salute the comers and goers as they passed, and then proceeded again without any serious interruption to the process. High mass was performing, with a full choir, the assistance of the organ, &c., and four priests at the altar, when we left the church.

I was much struck with the manner of a poor countryman, who came in with his blue frock and hob-nail shoes, and his rosary. He did not seem to know what to do; first he bowed, then he kneeled, then he stood, then he crossed himself, and after wriggling and shuffling about for a while, he turned away from the altar and went out, evidently dissatisfied with himself. Poor man—this is a hard service; if we had him in our adult school we would tell him of a milder master and teach him a better way.

LETTER XXVIII.

Brussels.

My Dear ——

I have heard much of the vice of the continent, but never had such demonstrations of it as at Liege, where we spent last Sunday; and I am sorry to say that Brussels is but little better. You will not, of course, expect that I should descend to particulars upon such a subject. Suffice it to say, that the vice which in other cities seeks the covert of the night, meets you here at noon-day, and is presented under circumstances of solicitation most oppressive and disgusting. Paris is purity itself, at least in its external demeanour, compared with these cities of the Netherlands.

Liege is a large, ancient, and irregularly built town. It is very pleasantly situated in a valley, watered by the Meuse, over which it has a venerable bridge of stone. Many of the houses are well built, and the neighbourhood is extremely populous. It is famous for its manufactories of cotton, and there is a great appearance of business in the place.

It being Sunday, we witnessed the celebration of mass at the cathedral, which is rather a neat than a magnificent gothic edifice. Two regiments of soldiers, one of horse and one of foot, filled the body of the church. They were remarkably fine looking men, and their dress was extremely neat; their band was in the organ-loft, and played during the greater part of the service. The whole ceremony appeared like any thing but religion and the worship of God. For, in the first place, not a single word that was said by the priest at the altar was heard by the people. In the second place, if they had heard, they would not have understood a syllable, it being all in Latin. In the third place, the people seemed to be perfectly unconcerned in what was going on, and the officers walked up and down in conversation with each other, as though they were on a parade, rather than in a church, except, indeed, when the little bell at the altar tinkled, to warn them that the sacramental cup was about to be elevated, and then, at the beat of the drum, all fell upon their knees, and ——must I record it to their disgrace—officers and men, with a very few exceptions, burst into laughter. Thus insulting the God of heaven, in what they call his temple, and with the most solemn service of their religion before their eyes.

In the afternoon I went again, and heard the vespers, and witnessed the solemnity of the repose of the host. The vespers were chanted by a full choir—and if the pealing organ—the melting tones of the human voice—the perfume of incense—and the magnificence and variety of sacred persons, with their utensils and their vestments can create devotion, they must be a very devout people. But—why should I write any more—I am heartily sick of such mummery and trumpery.

Returning to our hotel in the evening, we observed, in a back street in the outskirts of the town, an altar prepared, with a large crucifix, adorned with flowers and surrounded with candles, and the street decorated with sundry other blasphemous emblems—mottos and sacred finery—as if preparing for some grand ceremony. We inquired the occasion, and were informed that there was to be a fête in honour of Jesus Christ, and it was to begin at nine o'clock. We went: the whole of that part of the street was lighted up—the sides of the houses were covered with candles—the altar was a blaze of light, and chandeliers were suspended from lines over the middle of the street. In a room of a house on the opposite side of the street, was the orchestra, and there, by and by, the chanting in honour of Jesus Christ began. The audience consisted chiefly of ladies, with a description of whose quality I shall not defile my paper. We soon had enough of it. All hats were off, and a cry was raised for the removal of ours, but we happily escaped just in time to save our heads from the rough salutations which would probably have followed from our non-compliance with the general custom.

We saw a curious paper stuck up on the doors of some of the churches. I did not observe it myself till it was too dark distinctly to read the whole. Sir S——, however, assured me that he read it with great attention, and he could pledge his word that it was to the following effect.

There is a fast in the Romish church, called "The fast of forty hours," in imitation, I imagine, of the forty days' fasting of our Lord in the wilderness, in which Jesus Christ, in their language, remains forty hours upon the altar; when all good Christians are to repair to the said altar, to praise and adore him.

The paper referred to this fast, which either had been recently observed in Liege, or else was nigh at hand. It was headed "PRAISE AND ADORE JESUS CHRIST," and began by setting forth the great piety of the city of Liege in former times, insomuch that it was styled, "the eldest born of the church of Rome," and obtained many special privileges and indulgences from divers Popes. It then proceeded to state, that in those days of primitive piety, when Jesus Christ was thus exhibited on the altar, the crowds that repaired to pay their homage at his feet, were such, that many were squeezed to death by the pressure; but now Jesus Christ remained on the altar, and no one came to adore him. It then went on to state that some pious persons, moved with grief that Jesus Christ should be left thus alone, had conceived the idea of paying people to come and adore him—and the paper in question was, to entreat the alms of the faithful, for the defraying of this expense—urging it, as an inducement to liberality, that these devout persons, who were thus hired for the solemnity, should pray for those who piously contributed to the fund.

When I add to the above, that I saw a shop where they sell eau de vie, in other words, a gin-shop, with the sign of "THE NAME OF JESUS," written over the door, you will be able to form some idea of the piety of the city of Liege. Soldiers laughing at the sacrament—priests hiring people to adore the Saviour—and gin-shops dedicated to the name of Christ!

In perfect uniformity with this, the shops were on the Sunday all open—the streets were full of people, and business was going on as on any other day. In the opposite room in our hotel they were at cards all the afternoon, and there was a grand concert in the evening.

The country from Liege is rich, and in some parts beautiful. The appearance of the road—the character and costume of the people, especially the men—the number of carts and wagons—and the life and animation that every where surrounded us, indicated that we were in a manufacturing country. I was struck with the resemblance which it bore to many parts of Lancashire.

We passed through Louvain, the ancient capital of the united provinces of the Low Countries. It appears to be a venerable and interesting city. We observed the Hotel de Ville, which is certainly the richest specimen of architecture we have met with in the course of our tour.

Approaching Brussels, we had on our right a view of Lacken, the beautiful country palace of the king of the Netherlands. It stands upon a rising ground, surrounded by a wood, except in the front, where a noble vista opens, the width of the edifice, and affords a charming view of the adjacent country.

The morning after our arrival in Brussels, Lieut. H—— and myself started in a cabriolet for Waterloo. On leaving Brussels we turned to the right, and soon entered the forest of Soignies, through which we continued to travel till we reached the village of Waterloo. The vistas are extremely fine, and if there were no other attractions to Waterloo, this circumstance would render it a ride well worthy the occupation of a leisure morning. We reached Mount St. Jean, which is about a mile and a half from Waterloo, (and at which place the battle was fought,) about ten. We breakfasted at a little auberg at the end of the village, and having obtained the famous Jean-Baptiste La Coste, who was Bonaparte's guide on the memorable occasion of the battle, as our Cicerone, we proceeded to view the ground.

The high road through Waterloo to Charleroi passes directly across the centre of the scene of action. The first object that arrested our attention was a solitary tree, on a little elevation, and on a rising bank close on the right hand side of the road. This is called Wellington tree, from the circumstance that it was the station occupied by Lord Wellington—if he can be said to have had any station at all, for he was perpetually riding about, to animate his men, and during the whole of the day performed the service of a colonel to the respective regiments that needed the inspiration of his presence. But it was the rallying point for his staff, and there he was frequently himself. Just behind that tree, a cart path over the farm crosses the road. It has a bank of about three feet in height on each side of it, and here our troops hid themselves from the fury of the enemy's fire, by lying down upon the ground till they were wanted. One officer, who was in this lane, was greatly alarmed and extremely restless. His comrades cried out to him, that if he was afraid, the best thing he could do would be to lie still—but he would lift up his head to see what was going on, and that instant a cannon-ball carried it off. To the left of the road, a little beyond Wellington tree, are two other trees, he first about forty or fifty yards from the road, and the second about the same distance from the first. By the first, Gen. Picton fell, and by the second, Lord Uxbridge lost his leg—and still further to the left, in the valley, Colonel Ponsonby was killed. Far to the left, in that direction, is the wood from which the Prussians sallied at four, under Bulow, and at seven, under Blucher, when Lord Wellington perceiving their approach, made his final charge, and in ten minutes, as our guide expressed himself, the French were all in flight. Not many yards beyond Wellington tree, on the bank, close by the road side, Colonel Gordon, his aid-de-camp, received his mortal wound. A noble monument of black marble is now erecting on the spot, to perpetuate the memory of the event, by his sister and five brothers. From this monument you look down upon the farm-house of La Haye Sainte. It stands close to the right side of the road. There the Hanoverians of the German legion fought, till all their ammunition was exhausted, and then, to the amount of four hundred, they were put to the bayonet by the French. This seems to have been the only circumstance of omission with which Lord Wellington charged himself after the engagement. "We ought," said he, "to have made a hole in the wall at the back of the house, and have supplied them by that method with ammunition—but I could not think of every thing." The house and the barn face each other—the yard is between them, and they are connected at their gable ends by high walls—within this enclosure were the Hanoverians. Every where in the walls, and roofs, and timbers of the house and barn, are marks of the cannon and musketry, and on the walls of the barn are still to be seen the stains of the blood that was spilt, when, their ammunition being exhausted, the poor fellows were unable any longer to resist, and the French forcing their way into the enclosure, mowed them down like corn. We inquired for the old woman who remained uninjured in the cellar of the house during the whole of the action, but were told she was not there, as the family who then had the farm had since removed. At the top of the hill, about a quarter of a mile from the farm-house of La Haye Sainte, on the left hand side of the road, is the pot-house, called La Belle Alliance, and about half way between the farm-house and the Belle Alliance, where the high banks on either side the road defended him from the enemy's cannon, which passed over his head, was the principal station of Bonaparte during the greater part of the action, and where the guide said he remained five hours at one time. We halted, like exhausted heroes, for we were weary with wading in the mud, and drenched with rain, at the Belle Alliance. I took a glass of eau de vie, while we warmed ourselves by the fire which blazed on the hearth, in the miserable kitchen. The woman of the house told us she was there at the time of the battle, but that she fled to the woods during the heat of the action, and on her return, she found the house filled with the wounded. It was near this place that Wellington and Blucher met after the battle.

La Coste said that Bonaparte spoke but little during the battle—and when the fate of the day was determined against him, he simply cried, "It is all over," and fled. He was as pale as death. La Coste was with him till four in the morning, when he was dismissed.

What most of all struck me, and must I think strike every body, is the narrow compass of ground in which two such large armies were engaged, and so terrible a slaughter took place. It was not, as La Coste observed, a battle, it was a massacre—and the Duke of Wellington is understood to consider it as by no means so just an exhibition of his skill in military tactics as many of his former engagements.

The field of Waterloo is now rich in waving corn, ripening for the sickle of the husbandman. What a scene must it have been when death was the reaper, and gathered in his thousands of sheaves to the garner of the grave! And what a scene will it be again, when the trump of the archangel shall awake the sleepers that repose beneath its clods, and the mighty armies, that day annihilated, shall start up to life upon the plain on which they fell! I never heard a sermon so impressive as the silence that reigned around me on the field of Waterloo. I could not but connect their everlasting destinies, with the thousands of the dead upon whose dust I trod. The eternity that seemed to open there upon my view, peopled with the spirits of the slain, was an awful scene. The bitterness of dying on the field of battle—the widow's cries—the orphan's tears—the agonies of surviving friendship—were all forgotten; I only saw the immortal soul hurried unprepared, and, perhaps, blaspheming, into the presence of its God! I shuddered at the contemplation, and felt how deadly a scourge, how bitter a curse, is war!

I shall not weary you with a description of this city, now as well known to Englishmen as any fashionable watering place on our own coast. The number of English residents here is very considerable; but I find that the great advance in the price of provisions has determined many to leave, and some are already returned to their own country. There is not much splendour in the court, and there is more of elegance than magnificence in the royal and public edifices at Brussels. Sir S——— was presented, and is to dine with the king. His majesty works hard for the benefit of his people, and if a sincere desire to promote the interests of his subjects entitle him to popularity, he ought to be popular. But he is a Dutchman, and the Belgians do not like the Dutch, while the Dutch do not like his residing amongst the Belgians.

I was honoured with a kind note from the Duke of Kent, who is at present in Brussels, and enjoyed half an hour's conversation with his royal highness. The name of this prince I have long venerated, associated as it is with a liberal and enlightened mind, and connected with every noble and benevolent institution.

Brussels is, upon the whole, a fine city. We are in the best part of it, the Place Royale. You have soon seen every thing in it, however, and then it becomes insipid. For my part, I am quite tired of it already, and long for the hour when I shall set my face in earnest towards England. I wish to be again employed in the delightful, though arduous duties of my office, and look with blissful anticipation to those calm and happy hours, when in a domestic circle, which I now feel dearer to me than ever, I shall traverse again and again in narration, the lands I have visited, and the scenes I have explored. Till then, adieu.

LETTER XXIX.

Ramsgate.

My dear ———

I have just landed at this place, and though nearly three hundred miles from Liverpool, I already feel at home. I rejoice to be once more in a land where I am not a foreigner—where there is no need of a passport, nor further dread of custom-house officers—and where the mind is relieved from the painful consciousness of being ever under the observance of a watchful police—in the midst of a people, who, a few months ago, were our mortal enemies, and who may, for aught I can tell, become so again. From the constant exhibition of a passport, and the observance of all those precautionary arrangements, to which in a foreign land one is obliged to conform, I have felt all along like a prisoner at large; and am of opinion that an Englishman ought to travel abroad, and submit to be examined, and have his name, and country, and profession, and destination, &c., all recorded for the inspection of the police at every town he passes, fully to appreciate and enjoy the freedom of his native land.

I left our party at Brussels on Thursday evening, and came by the diligence to Ghent, and from thence by the barge to Bruges and Ostend. Having an hour to spare at Ghent, I repaired to the cathedral. It is a spacious and venerable structure, simply majestic in the style of its architecture, and with little decoration but its paintings, which are esteemed remarkably fine. The pulpit is supported by a mass of exquisite marble sculpture, representing a man starting as from a dream at the call of the gospel, which is personified by a dignified figure, with a bible open on his bosom, at those words, to which he is significantly pointing, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." The guide at the cathedral was a very civil, intelligent, and complaisant sort of fellow. He paid a compliment to my French, according to custom, at the expense of truth—and reminded me of a waiter in Paris, who said, in answer to a question put to him by an Englishman, "You speak excellent French, sir, but, pardon me, I cannot understand you."

At Ostend I had the happiness to meet with Admiral F—— and Mr. C——, with whom I joined in the hire of a boat to carry us immediately to England. We have had rather a rough and tedious passage. We sailed from Ostend yesterday morning at four, and did not arrive here till one o'clock to-day. We had a very unpleasant altercation with the custom-house officers at Ostend, owing to our having gone on board the packet at midnight, a circumstance which they construed into a clandestine departure, but to which we were led altogether by the suggestions of the captain. For my part, I must confess, I did not much like the idea of leaving the country under such an imputation. We were obliged, however, quietly to submit to the re-examination of our trunk, and were not a little pleased when these troublesome visiters took their final leave. But all these little inconveniences of the tour are now forgotten, in gratitude to the kind providence which has protected me, and in the pleasure which the review of it does, and will long afford. I do not regret that I have seen a little of other countries, for I have thereby learned to prize more highly the privileges of my own.

I have, indeed, witnessed much to interest and please me, both in the works of God and man. But I have also seen some things to grieve and to disgust me—and nothing that has tended in the least to weaken my attachment to my native land. I trust that I am not so censurably absorbed in the love of my own country, that I can allow no excellence to any other. But, certainly, I have seen no people more happy—no towns and cities more prosperous, than those of England. And if I have passed, in some places, edifices more magnificent, and bolder scenery than any she can boast, yet no where have I beheld such neatness and comfort as, in many of her districts, distinguish the dwellings of the peasantry, nor such noble institutions for the instruction of the ignorant and the relief of the distressed. But it is in her religious advantages, chiefly, that Britain surpasses every other land. It is by her sublime and hallowed associations for the diffusion of knowledge, and the promulgation of the Gospel through a benighted world, that she is most of all dignified and adorned. This it is that has made her the wonder and admiration of the globe. Long may she continue to advance in this glorious cause, unappalled by the gigantic forms of misery and vice, that meet her in her benevolent career, and heedless of the scoffs of infidelity that pursue her, as she passes on. Amid the repose which mankind once more enjoy, let it be hers to cultivate the arts of peace. Let it be hers to proclaim in this joyous jubilee of the world, the acceptable year of the Lord. Let her pour the balm of the Gospel into the wounds of bleeding nations. Let her plant the tree of life in every soil, that suffering kingdoms may repose beneath its shade, and feel the virtue of its healing leaves, till all the kindreds of the human family shall be bound together in one common bond of amity and love, and the warrior shall be a character unknown but in the page of history.

THE

CHURCH OF GOD,

IN

A SERIES OF DISSERTATIONS.

BY

THE REV. ROBERT WILSON EVANS,

FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

DISSERTATION I.

ON THE OBJECTS OF REVELATION, AND ON THE SPIRIT IN WHICH IT SHOULD BE RECEIVED.

But the natural man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned.—1 Cor. ii. 14.

THE natural man here mentioned by the apostle, is a title which will apply to two classes of mankind. It may designate either those who, left entirely to their own faculties and notions, derive no knowledge whatever of God from Revelation; or those who, living under the blessings of a Revelation, think and act just as if it had never reached their ears—who, reckless and unconscious of the light which it had afforded, even to themselves in despite of themselves, attribute such knowledge as they have of heavenly things to mere force of human reason, and set down the revealed mysteries of God as the discoveries of inquiring man. With the former character, it is our supreme blessing not to be immediately concerned: in the latter, our interest is close and painful. It encounters us continually both from without and from within. It is not confined to the immoral and thoughtless professor of the Gospel, but attaches itself more or less to all who have not perfected their faith; to all who, not having as yet completely ascertained, by study of the Word, by inquiry into their own hearts and understandings, and by a comparison of the results in each case, the whole sum of what they have owed to God's special instructions, and, insufficiently humbled, persist in claiming for their own self-acquired knowledge, one iota of his blessed Revelation. Who must not plead guilty here, if he but diligently discuss his past and present frame of mind? For the more we think, the more we find ourselves beholden to it, and the less therefore to have been hitherto our sense of its exceeding value. Alas! we are too apt to forget the Giver in the enjoyment of our bodily blessings; but still less lively is our sense of his extraordinary intervention displayed in the possession of our spiritual; if thanksgiving be too often neglected after earthly food, still more frequently is it omitted after heavenly. We need not go far for the reason of this perverseness. The former class of blessings contains the supplies to the primary wants of our animal nature; their renewal is continually sought by its appetites, they are necessary to its very existence; hence they obtain the earnest attention of our mind, ever rousing it and keeping it alive by their palpable obviousness and continual repetition. But the character of the latter class is just the reverse of all this. The daily bread which they supply is not necessary either to the existence or enjoyment of the body; it is spiritually taken, and, therefore, the want of it can be discerned by such only as have become conscious of their spiritual nature, and accordingly grown desirous of satisfying its cravings. It is not, therefore, until our spiritual man hath at least gained one victory over our natural, hath entered the house and bound the strong man who had us in possession, that the occupation of our attention can be vindicated, and our minds left free to the solicitation of the nobler blessings. Then, indeed, searching the resources of our own minds within, appreciating their supplies from without, we arrive at the vital distinction between what we know of God and things appertaining to God, by mere force of our natural unassisted powers, and what by means of his extraordinary illumination. Then we daily grow more acute in the discernment of this difference; until, in the end, with a strength of conviction which the wise of this world may call bigotry, and with a depth of humiliation which they may term abjectness, we clearly perceive, and frankly acknowledge, ascribing glory and thanks unto God the Father, through Jesus Christ his Son, our Saviour, that from our own selves we know nothing of heavenly things, but that from him, and by the mercy of his special intervention with our fallen nature, we derive every and the least particle of our knowledge of him as he really is.

But how many, professing the name of Christ, have fought and won this glorious victory? How many have even ever bethought themselves of the necessity of the struggle? Alas! the natural man, in the second sense of the word, is but too common a character in the visible church of God. Indolently succumbing to his animal nature, he passively acquiesces in the results of his education and experience: a series of notions on high and awful subjects have become familiar to him, and both pride and ignorance conspire to lead him to regard all familiar truths as the property of his own mind. These, according as he is content to take his place amid the crowd, or is ambitious of the character of a philosopher, he throws into the common mass of first principles and incontestible axioms, or places among the sure deductions of human reason: hence much unconscious practical infidelity, and hence, alas! some avowed apostacy. To nature is ascribed what nature could never give, and to God are refused acknowledgments for what God could alone bestow. On the very threshhold, then, of addressing to any Christian body an investigation into the nature and properties of the church of God, we find it necessary to ascertain the point at which its extraordinary supply of knowledge, meeting the deficiencies of our nature, comes in aid of our ordinary information. The discovery of this will disclose at once the special blessedness and high privileges of which we are too apt to be unconscious. Thus we shall see the utter destitution of the natural man, and the unbounded wealth of the spiritual man. Thus we shall learn duly to value the waters of our unearthly Jordan, and, with the fastidious daintiness of the Persian king, to drink of one river only,—spiritual kings from a spiritual river. Thus we shall duly appreciate the milk and honey of our holy land; and, contrasting its glorious abundance with the scanty springs, the bitter wells, and the palling food of the wilderness, in which our natural man was so long wandering, tempting and grieving God, we shall joyfully advance with his pillar of light in our front, explore still further, still more carefully, and finally find therein our everlasting habitation.

The necessary objects, therefore, of a Revelation from God, or, in other words, the fundamental principles of his church upon earth, require our present discussion. And for this we have most ample materials provided. Not only have we the result at which our minds, well explored and carefully abstracted from the associations of revealed truth, can arrive, (how does the very difficulty of the abstraction display the abundance of God's mercy!) but we have at the same time the results which the most gifted minds of former days obtained, in such a search—minds, these, unfettered by the associations which ours find it so painful to throw off. The ancient philosophers were men placed in very different (and, for the mere present purpose, in very advantageous) circumstances from ourselves. They had been violently driven by the superstitions, with which religion had been overlaid, to forego all tradition, in which channel alone, however corrupt, God's Revelation could have reached them, and to yield themselves unreservedly to the deductions of their natural unassisted reason. If, then, having laid down the questions which it must be the prime object of moral and intellectual man to solve, we have reason to conclude, from the examination of our minds, that they could never of themselves have obtained the solution; and if, further, those men failed also, and came grievously short of the end, notwithstanding an enviable possession of all human acquirements which would seem requisite for the end; although they were the lights of their several ages and countries, and, earnestly bent upon the discovery, engaged head and heart in the service; although they were sages, whose acute understandings, refined by severest discipline, and unremittingly employed in pressing on to the furthest limits at which the light of nature was visible, left unexplored no attainable point in things and relations, human and divine;—if this shall be our conclusion, then we shall have determined the objects of a Revelation from God.

Notwithstanding all the discussions upon the supreme good, we may safely pronounce, that the universal desire of mankind is, to be released from the perplexities and apprehensions attendant upon their view of death. In this view are terminated all their hopes and fears. All the sufferings of the body, all the reverses of life, are secondary to this last of sufferings, this last and greatest of changes. The living principle within men is continually whispering, (and making up for argument by perseverance,) that there is something beyond the grave, and the pangs of the dissolving body are as nothing in the scale, weighed with the anxiety and doubt attendant upon the thoughts of what may await us beyond. To trample, therefore, under foot the insatiable grave, to take the sting out of its terrors, is his grand moral endeavour. To ensure this triumph, he puts on all his intellectual armour, and gives the keenest edge to the sword of his understanding. Now this, his prime object, steadily followed up, will involve him in the following questions:

First, Finding himself, in common with all around him, subject to a perpetual, invisible, invincible controul, he has here discovered the arbiter of life and death; the properties, therefore, of this influential being, and the various relations existing between these, and such as belong to man, are to be sought out.

Secondly, These being found, must be the means, if there be any, of determining the question of death, whether we be concerned in any state beyond it, or not.

Thirdly, Supposing the belief in a future state to be the result of this inquiry, then follows the anxious question, whether this state have a retrospective view to our conduct in this life, and shall be happy or miserable, according as we have been good or wicked.

And, Fourthly, If such a future state be credible, then may there not be a hope afforded to imperfect man, that, as in the case of retribution in this life, repentance may procure remission of punishment.

Such is the series of questions, the solution of which touches the highest interests of man. In other words, they are, the attributes of God, the life and judgment to come, the forgiveness of sins. These, therefore, if they shall appear incapable of proof upon any ground of human reason, will be the grand objects of a Revelation from God. The Deist no doubt will smile to see placed to this account, truths which he reckons so obvious to reason. How obvious they are, let him judge, when he has entirely stripped himself of all the prejudices of an education in a Christian country: how obvious they have been, let him consider, when he turns over the pages of the most subtle reasoners of antiquity. We will now briefly examine them, in order.

On the subject of the attributes of God, it is necessary to attend to a distinction, which has been too seldom kept in sight. They form two separate classes, according as we consider God to be the physical creator and maintainer of the universe, or to be its moral governor. These bring us into very different degrees of intimacy with him; and the discovery of the one class is very far indeed from introducing us to the knowledge of the other. The confusion of them has led to much undue stress being laid upon natural theology, (the real value of which, however, I would be the last to decry,) and lies, indeed, at the bottom of all infidelity.

Let us, then, in the first place, suppose that, by comparing the appearances and operations of the sensible world with the effects of his own powers and faculties, the natural man, ascending to a first cause, has established to his entire conviction the certainty of the existence of a sole, almighty, all-wise, all-good, everlasting being, the maker of every thing in heaven and earth. To this, as the arbiter of his fate, as the creator and maintainer of his life, as the author of all its blessings. he will reasonably offer praise, adoration, and thanksgiving (Rom. i. 21). Now, had man continued in his innocence, this knowledge had plainly been quite sufficient: all of which he knew was good: evil was unknown to him. His blessed state therefore required not the notion of God's attributes as a moral governor, who in him had as yet no sin to pity, to pardon, to rebuke, or to punish. But very different, alas! is the case with fallen man. He knows evil; he is surrounded by it on every side, in every shape of sin, and death. What comfort shall he derive now from the contemplation of this being? The more he contemplates him, the further he finds himself removed from him. If he look up to heaven, there he sees world beyond world intervening between; if he look down upon earth, there he finds beneath him world below world (even until it be contained in a drop of water) interposing, and blocking up his way in this direction. He finds himself shrunk up into a point amid infinity. How shall he have intercourse with a being which thus recedes as he advances, and whom he finds, at the end of the furthest possible pursuit of his intellect, more remote than ever? How shall he assure himself of the sympathy of such a being; how shall he refer his practice to this obscure and distant abstraction, this occupant of his head and not of his heart; what chords of relation shall be drawn to connect the weakness, the folly, the unholiness of man, with the perfect power. wisdom, and goodness of this being? Alas! the loss of innocence! how utterly did it sever the links of communication between God and man. Fallen man finds a lamentable change in himself, which requires a corresponding change in this unchangeable being, in order to maintain any connexion with him. Looking up from his dungeon of bodily and mental anguish, perplexity, and despair, he desires the interference of some superior being, who may so far resemble himself as to pity him, to pardon him, to do him right. He longs to discover a moral governor of the universe. to whom he may appeal for support amid such intolerable evils. And now how shall he proceed? Shall he invest this being with attributes derived from perfect human government? So say his feelings: but what says his reason? Will an abiding and rational conviction (and without this there can be no faith, no religion) give testimony to this yearning? Will reason allow him to invest with the attributes of man this being, which continually recedes further from him at every approach which he essays? She rudely repelled him on the very steps of the entrance into the sanctuary. She coldly asked him how to this sole perfect being he could ascribe qualities which owe their existence (as far as he knows) to the mutual dealings of imperfect beings? How shall he ascribe to him mercy, of which man could never have formed the notion, much less exercised the quality, had he not been an offender? how imagine the combination of perfect justice and perfect mercy, (for in a perfect being both these must be perfect.) when the more perfect we conceive each to be, the more irreconcilable do they appear? How attribute to pure mind qualities which our experience denies to exist apart from body? If man, either not consulting, or not following reason when consulted, gave vent to his feelings, and invested this being with moral attributes, the consequences were such as always result from withdrawing the latter from the regulations of the former. Human vices soon come upon the list of attributes, and at last quite thrust out the virtues. God became, in human notions, a powerful, but evil and capricious, being; and thus in the end "he changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things—they changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever." If, however, the man of reason started from this dream of absurdity into which he had been betrayed, and turned aside to the investigation of the divine nature, he met with no better success. He inquired, was this being pure mind, or compounded of mind and body? The first supposition was to him inconceivable, and, as to any practical purpose, unavailing. He had recourse therefore to the latter, and thus God, after all, was an animal! The most rational of such as adopted this monstrous supposition, conceived the universe to be the body through which the divine mind was diffused. This Pantheism, by deifying parts of the whole, brought the philosopher back to his old prison-house, the polytheism of the vulgar, and thus he also, "thinking himself wise, became a fool, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like corruptible man." Thus the attributes of God, as moral governor of the universe, being undiscoverable by human reason, are known to man by Revelation alone.

But, in the next place, these being unknown, it is quite impossible that he can proceed to the knowledge of the life and judgment to come. Nor were these points ever seriously entertained by the ancient philosophers; such as gratified their natural longing after immortality by specious conjectures, unable to admit the separate existence of mind, (however separate in nature from the body,) considered the human mind as a portion of the divine pervading mind, and held, that to this, after the dissolution of the enclosure of the flesh, it became re-united. On this ground they readily built the doctrines of pre-existence and transmigration; but the preservation of the same individual consciousness after death, a point so necessary to a state of future retribution, was any thing but a necessary consequence of this hypothesis.

The natural man's ignorance of God's moral attributes, is at once fatal to the reasoning of certain deists, who, having recourse to the consideration of the unequal distribution of good and evil in this life, assert it to be imperative upon God's justice to correct this in another life, and thus imagine that reason has proved the doctrine. Were we even to grant them the knowledge of those attributes as founded in reason, they would even then be unable to prove their point; for they must prove that the above inequality is real, and not apparent, which is contrary to the known fact, that no wise and good man would at any moment exchange his condition, bodily and mental, with another. They must show us that the good and evil implied in this argument are intrinsically good and evil, since some sages have denied them to be such, and others allowed them to be but trivially such; and they must show why this corrective life must needs be immortal, instead of the same length with the original life.

It is true, that a belief in a future state has pervaded all ages and all countries. But this fact, to which, after all his attempts at demonstration, the philosopher was compelled to appeal, needs only show that it has been revealed at a period before mankind was divided into nations and distant lands: and indeed, it seems a moral impossibility, that a doctrine touching our welfare so vitally, presenting the ultimate object of all hope and fear, applicable to an event daily suggested to the mind from sights without and feelings within; which so continually receives apparent confirmation from the spectral illusions of our imagination; which reconciles us at once to the seemingly unequal distribution of the good and evil of this life, and thus particularly interests the poor and the afflicted, who always form the great mass of mankind,—it seems impossible that such a doctrine, once established by Revelation, should ever, in any very material degree, be forgotten. We have thus produced the second object of Revelation.

On the third head we might have spared all discussion, since it is a question of one of God's moral attributes, and therefore undemonstrable by reason. We should, therefore, have here dismissed it, had it not been not only the principal attribute in which we are concerned, but also the most remote from our apprehension; had it not been the most familiar to us in Revelation, and therefore been deemed by the heedless the most obvious to our faculties; had it not been taken for granted, as a matter of course, by those who deny the grounds on which Revelation places it,—that is, on the satisfaction of Christ; had it not been the main link, or rather the only one which connects God and man.

Derived, as our sense of this attribute is, from human dealings, we must suppose it to be called forth in God by the same cause as in the most perfect man,—that is, by repentance on the part of the offender. But what, excepting a familiarity, through eighteen hundred years, with the joyful proclamation of their mutual relation, could have led men to think that the connexion between the two was necessary and demonstrable, and to mistake for cause and effect what God's good pleasure alone, and this upon specified grounds, has made constant concomitants? The demonstration attempted by the gainsayers of Revelation, proceeds through a long array of postulates, which can never be granted by reason. They assume, that an infinitely holy being like God, must (and not may) have a kind consideration for so unholy a being as offending man: that his love must needs remain after its only conceivable object, man's innocence, shall have been obliterated: that love enlarged to infinity must thereby take in objects unworthy of it, while justice enlarged to infinity must not include objects which are deserving of its animadversions; that God's justice, assumed here to admit of satisfaction from men, can receive in compensation from the offender any thing which is not God's already: that a principle which has its very foundation in the liability of offending and offended man, to change their relative places, and in the assurance which the penitent gives of future security to the offended, must be applicable to the relations existing between two parties, one of which is infinitely holy and infinitely powerful: that the amendment of the life future must influence the character of the life past: that the doing our duty through a part of life, must be equivalent to doing it through the whole: that the means of making reparation must always continue, though the objects of our offence are daily vanishing from this fleeting world, and our condition is never the same: that, lastly, analogy,—in such cases as the present, of peculiar moment,—is in favour of their argument, while it is, on the contrary, directly opposed to it. For when we look on the face of the world, do we not continually observe, that no tears of repentance, however sincere; no pangs of sorrow and contrition, however sharp, can avert or even arrest the penalties which men have incurred in the body? we see disease incurable, poverty irremediable, disgrace irreparable. To all this we may add, that were a principle, important as this, so obvious to human reason, we ought surely to meet with it in the writings of the ancient moralists. No where, however, does it appear. In this, then, we have the third object of Revelation.

But there remains another point still, and as yet unadverted to, because it is only after having had these three secured and certified to us that we discover the necessity of a Revelation of God upon it. Our very riches open our eyes to our poverty, just as our learning does to our ignorance. This point is the assurance of God's grace to help our infirmities. We remarked how man shrank into a point on the contemplation of the intellectual and physical attributes (so to call them) of God. What, then, shall he appear, upon the contemplation of his moral attributes, to which he is now introduced? In the former case, we confess our utter insignificance; we are humbled at the nothingness of our most boasted power and intelligence; we cry out, "Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou regardest him?" But in the latter case, we are brought down to a strain of humiliation far lower than this; we have to confess utter unworthiness, to acknowledge the want of holiness and goodness; we cry out, "God be merciful to me a sinner." There our understanding was humbled, and we sank in the scale of intelligent beings; but here our heart is arraigned, and we sink in the scale of good beings. From this despair God's forgiveness raises us. But will this satisfy us now? God, in the revelation of his moral attributes, hath opened our eyes to the dazzling riches of moral excellence; he has awakened our hearts to aspirations after its attainment. And has he admitted us to this view only to gaze and despair? Hath he given us light and life, and yet condemned us to the scale, in the spiritual world, of the periwinkle on the rock, helpless and motionless? No! Here, for the fourth time, hath God intervened with his gifts of glorious mercy. He hath bidden us be holy as he is holy; he hath commanded us to be conformed to his own image, as expressed in his blessed and only begotten Son. And for this he has promised us the help of his grace; he hath revealed to us its exceeding riches and unsearchable means.

Such are the objects of a Revelation from God. In making, however, this statement, we readily allow, if we have not implied, that there are certain grand truths in harmony with our nature, which alone can satisfy its insatiable craving, and they are signified generally by our faculties and feelings in our various guesses, desires, and aspirations. But what they are particularly, God, and not man, must show, since they require for their certainty not only a strict inquiry into our own minds, but also a free revelation of God's. When, therefore, by God's goodness and mercy they are discovered to us, we joyfully hail and accept them, on his authority; we eagerly grasp them as the thing so much wanted, and now at length found; as changing into a definite and stable hope, an indefinite and uneasy longing. Then we find that all our previous mental wants, and guesses at the objects which should satisfy those wants, have been but false notes, struck here and there around the true. This master-note we were unable, after long-repeated endeavours, to hit of ourselves. But as struck for us by our Heavenly Teacher, our ear instantly recognizes the desired sound, and the harmony, so long sought in vain, has become complete. Now all is peace and content ineffable. For all the horrid and distracting confusion of means without objects, and of objects without means; all the sense-bewildering storms of unaccountably opposed good and evil; all the tempests of pain and sorrow, and roar of the grave, have been rebuked into order, and calmed, at the voice of our almighty, all-wise, all-merciful Master.

Oh! Members of the Church of God! consider the abyss of darkness from which the announcement of a few propositions hath delivered us. Think of our bliss in having for a guide the certainty of Revelation, and not the disputable questions of philosophy. Even the heathen may teach us something here: for if he felt so thankful for the doubtful glimmer of this latter; if he could perceive a warmth imparted from it amid most heart-chilling troubles, public and private, so as to call it the consoling light of life, how ought we to hail the full blaze of brightness which the former has poured around our paths. Can we think seriously enough, feel deeply enough, be diligent enough, be thankful enough? Let us but call to mind those moments when we have assuaged some nighly overwhelming pang of sorrow, by the balm of the hope of the everlasting bliss hereafter; confronted some peril or terror in joyful resignation into the hands of a just and merciful Father in heaven; relieved a burdened conscience by confession to a forgiving God: then let us ponder and consider what had been the agony, not of the moment, but of days and years, yea, even of a whole life, had we never known those stays and comforts which Revelation has supplied, had this life of sorrow been all, had God's love never been declared, had guilt been inexpiable? When we talk, amid our sorrows and wrongs, of a just and kind Father in heaven, and of a better world to come, let us remember how and from whom we have learned these things; call to mind from whom and for how long they were hidden; consider where are our merits for which we have been thus preferred, the meanest of us in virtue and talent, to the brightest examples of both in ancient days. Can we, dare we, remain indifferent to so great salvation? Be assured that in the moment that we lose the consciousness of God's unsearchable mercy to us here, we are spiritually dead, even as our body is dead when it ceases to be conscious of the light, and the heat, and various fostering influences of the outward world. Our neglect has no excuse; our responsibility here goes far beyond that which we incur on any other point. Are men deemed excusable, are they not daily condemned by us, who neglect their natural faculties, although, from intimate and habitual possession, and from the power of improving them which we feel that we possess, we are too much accustomed to think them our own property, with which we may do as we please? At all events, we do not ascribe them to any special interference of God. Can we then, without condemnation, slight the possession of knowledge and power of understanding which God, by clear and special intervention, hath superadded to these faculties, in order to give them point and direction, and contribute to our eternal well-being? and this, too, when the voice of history has declared, our daily experience has shown, and His holy word has earnestly warned us, that, without this direction, they will be so employed as to be a stumbling-block instead of a guide, and darkness instead of light? Men do not, in their sober senses, turn away from the wholesome fruits of the earth and all its bounteous repast, and attempt to nourish their bodies with poisonous herbs, or wood, or stone. And as little claim shall we have to the possession of right reason, if we spurn the thoughts which God hath specially set down as its natural food for our mind's healthy entertainment, and seek to batten upon the vanity of mere human learning, and worldly elements. But beyond all predecessors in the church of God, the Christian is inexcusable, if he forget or neglect the blessings of Revelation; for the unveiling of mysteries, hidden from the beginning of the world, has been reserved for him; on this youngest and most favoured child the Father hath poured out all the treasures of spiritual knowledge, emptied them to their inmost cells. He hath not only promised, but performed; not only told, but exhibited. Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son, being the visible image of Him whom no eye can see, hath expressed and declared him. Jesus hath wept, hath healed, hath blessed, hath forgiven, hath raised from the dead, as being God—hath risen from the dead, as being man. Thus, by a clear exhibition to our senses, by a direct appeal to our heart, and not by mere information to our understanding, we have been assured of the grand points of Revelation, and had their bearings and importance exemplified before our eyes.

Two mistakes are committed in the treatment of Revelation. Some go in curious investigations beyond it, and endeavour to fill up chasms; as, for instance, that intervening between God's foreknowledge and men's freewill, which Revelation having left, no additional aid from reason can ever fill up; every load of argument which it throws in sinks down into an unfathomable abyss; every structure which it attempts to throw across, only projects sufficiently to show the man, who uses its frail stage, the horrible depths below, while he still looks in vain for the other shore. But the number of such persons is inconsiderable, compared with that of such as come short of Revelation, and never was this short-coming so grievously prevalent as in the present times. Through the abundance of information poured around, men's minds are, as it were, in a tropical clime, where labour seems equally needless and burdensome. The vain presumption of knowledge prevent men from discerning their ignorance, puffing them up with a pride which will not stoop to be informed, and unnerving them with an indolence which will not strive to learn. Hence, in common with all the rest of their information, their religious belief (if such can be called a bundle of opinions about which the owner is indifferent) is no longer, as in better days, a clear stream pouring from one head, and proceeding to one point. It is a muddy stagnant pool, passively receiving any chance-coming feeder, which the abundance of the rains may cause to flow for an hour or two, turbid with particles of earth. Here, therefore, it has inevitably received a portion of natural knowledge; there, unconsciously, and from mere chance of proximity, a part of revealed knowledge. And these are promiscuously taken in with utter recklessness of inquiry into the real deficiency of the one, and the real plenitude of the other; or into the foulness of the one and the purity of the other. To such persons, all opinions on religion are indifferent, and an opinion at all upon religion, whatever it may be, passes with them for religion. Meanwhile the deep and fundamental doctrines of the gospel, its unbending and peculiar articles, are treated as dogmas of the schools, not as objects of belief to society; as debateable grounds for the theologian, not a base of principles to the layman. Laxity of opinion, in any case, is a wretched imbecility; in religious matters it is not only this, but also a moral delinquency. In contrast to such conduct, let us be careful to seek out and accept the whole of Revelation, to drink the whole of the cup of salvation which God hath so bounteously put into our hands, nor to rest satisfied with the taste on the lips of that which he designs to pervade the whole body with life and heat. Half of truth is inevitably accompanied with a corresponding half of error, so that the whole shall be pernicious. We can yield no obedience to God's will, repose no faith in his promise, arrive at no correct understanding of his word, if we suffer either indolence, or pride, or any corrupt affection, or worldly occupation, to stop us midway in our course. We must go, if we would be safe, to the full extent of all the knowledge which God hath thought fit to communicate. How else can we discern its real importance? Will the sight of a few bricks give us any idea of the house? How, without feeling, within ourselves, and of ourselves, its importance, can we give it its due and lofty supremacy over all the other notions and affections of our minds, making it a master amid servants there, and thus employing it in its high and proper office of a ruling principle, in which the whole body of our thoughts and feelings shall find a head, and all grow up unto the fulness of the image of God?

A common excuse which men provide for their laxity of opinion, and utter indifference in forming it, is the variety of creeds adopted in the Christian world. This fact is greedily caught up by all the superficial, by all the indifferent, by every gainsayer of the faith. The Bible, it seems, is an unsorted heap of dogmas, a vast magazine of the conflicting opinions of innumerable sects; its spirit is the spirit of free-thinking. I would that these persons would in the first place inquire, and distinguish between creeds, which are the ephemeral mud-nurtured spawn of our own luxurious and sunny times,—which have enervated the mind and made it at once ignorant and rebellious, indolent and unsteady; and creeds which have grown up amid blood and persecution, when able and learned men were compelled to concentrate all their intellectual powers, and give up all their hearts and minds to that word in whose truth alone they could find rest or happiness. How beautifully harmonious in all essentials are these latter; what an unity of spirit do they breathe under such manifold varieties of men, of customs, of countries, of circumstances. I would that in the next place they would seek and distinguish essentials from accidentals. The former must ever be the same, the latter will depend upon times and circumstances. These, rated at their highest, can be nothing more than the limbs of the outward body, which may be absent without any loss of life, without the least detriment to mental and spiritual vigour, though not to comeliness and usefulness. But those, like the parts of the inward body, the lungs, the heart, and the rest of the vitals, are such, that if one be absent or imperfect, the whole body must perish. The sign of the cross may be retained or rejected; but the divinity of Christ cannot be asserted or denied. And woe to him who quotes variety of opinion on the former question, to excuse his indifference to the latter.

On a wise and ingenuous mind, the sight of such varieties, so far from producing the effect of indifference, will rather impress an earnest desire to seek for himself, and search into the whole truth. Therefore, my brethren, let no indolence dissuade us from this; let no worldly business or pleasure distract us from this. Let us begin it with a pure, earnest, and humble heart, so that no caprice or predisposing affection shall direct us exclusively to one point,—so that no perverse vanity shall prompt us to lay undue stress on any part, which shall thus overthrow the just balance of the whole,—so that no love of singularity and paradox shall allure us to exhibit the whole under new and unnatural combinations of parts; nor all of these, the besetting infirmities of our day, conspire to satisfy us that we have learned enough, whensoever it shall be our pleasure to leave off. Under a deep and due sense of the awful responsibility to which a Revelation from God, and, above all, that through Christ, subjects us, looking to him and not unto man, let us begin and proceed in our work, reading, marking, learning, and inwardly digesting. Nor let us flatter ourselves, as we discuss each point, that the opinion to which we shall come will not be momentous. A wrong opinion taken up, where God had put in our power a clue to a right, is no infirmity, but a sin, a grievous sin, involving many sins,—as perverseness, unthankfulness, recklessness, want of sincerity, contempt of God's gifts, indifference to his honour and glory. However, therefore, when we come from our chamber to the society of men, we may view with charity, yea, even with affection, the entertainers of erroneous doctrine, yet with the doctrine itself we must make no compromise, nor, like the false prophets of old, cry out, "peace, peace," where there can be no peace. A Christian's charity will lead him to think and hope the best of his neighbour, and, above all, he will fear to judge, lest he be judged. But his love of truth, his allegiance to his Saviour, his fear of God, will not allow him for a moment to conceive, that he himself, under all his own peculiar means and opportunities, would not be in a most perilous state, were he to maintain the same opinions, or even to give them the least indulgence, when produced before him. This last is that spurious misnamed charity, and real uncharitableness, which goes to destroy two souls at once,—both of him in error who might have been convinced, and of himself who bears with that error which he might have convicted.

We are God's work, God's property, to the very inmost chambers of our mind. Him, therefore, must we serve, his will must we seek and obey; nor can we act according to his will in the body, without first thinking according to his will in the mind. God is not a man that he should punish the deed alone. We shall think the cognizance of all-seeing God is imperfect as that of purblind man, and shall resemble those weak knaves who reckon indifferent all which the law does not enforce, if we shall imagine that our opinions, however sincerely held, are indifferent before God. To him we must account for the manner in which they have been formed. Man punishes with his law as far as his cognizance can reach. Shall not then the supreme Lawgiver and Governor punish to the extent of his cognizance also—that is, to the very bottom of the heart, to the inmost recesses of our understanding? What! shall He whose eye is over all be limited, like man, to the view of the outward shape in which a thought is expressed? shall he but stand outside the door to gather the overheard and doubtful signs of the iniquity going on within, having no authority to enter; or shall he not enter at once, with the scourge of vengeance in his hand? Two grand errors are continually besetting us on this point of following diligently up to its full extent a Revelation from God. One is an overweening opinion of the supremacy of our will over our understanding; the other is an under-rating of the responsibility of our understanding. The former arises from distinguishing the understanding in contrast from the heart; and because this implicitly obeys the impressions from without, while that, at the same time, is independent of them, men are led to conceive that their will, which is thus controuled in the one, has its full sway in the other. A grievous and fatal mistake this; for seldom is it the intellectual will which leads us to the choice of subjects for the understanding; and even this, however independent we may think it, may be enslaved in consequence of an improper choice. For a wrong opinion, once adopted by the understanding, may ever after, by influencing his feelings, and administering to his passions, hold the person captive, so that he shall not command even a wish to be free. Thus the understanding may be blinded, no less than the heart may be hardened; and the one requires for its health, to be fed with right reason, no less than the other, for its soundness, with right affection. Therefore, let us beware how we disqualify ourselves for accepting in purity and fulness the Revelation of God, by tampering with this momentous faculty, by darkening the sight of the mind, by losing all use and exercise of such an instrument. Shall we be excused for incapacity of knowing God's will, when we have wilfully brought that incapacity upon ourselves? Then will the poltroon, who has purposely maimed his best limb, be excused his inefficiency for service. Gradual and most insidious are the advances of that corruption of the understanding which blinds it to the knowledge of God. The offences and ailments of the body immediately strike and disgust the sense, and may thus raise a timely alarm; but those of the understanding unveil themselves but after a long accumulation of disease, and even then the present condition of mind and body, as being at hand, too often bears the blame of the thought, word, or deed. The understanding, from its seeming remoteness from the scene of action, obtains an alibi. And hence it is continually allowed to sin, because it is deemed incapable of sinning.

The latter error is not less momentous. Most awfully responsible are we for the use and abuse of every faculty of mind, whose integrity may promote, or whose perversion may obstruct, our reception of so inestimable a blessing as a Revelation from God. All mankind with one voice concur in condemning the man who is heedless of natural religion, as a monster, as a wild beast, whom human society cannot away with. What ought they, if consistent, to think of him who slights revealed religion? If the apostle has solemnly declared that men were inexcusable in neglecting to derive a knowledge of the Godhead, or in drawing wrong deductions upon the same, from his visible works, are they not much more inexcusable, who, from want of attention, or from corrupt passions, or from both, either neglect or recklessly form false notions of his written word, of his expressed will, which is not unseen, and to be gathered by a train of reasoning from things seen, but lies open and visible before their eyes? Will he bear with those for a moment, who content themselves with vague and inadequate notions of his nature and relations to man, when he has not, as of old, darkly hinted them through the ordinary operations of Providence, but peculiarly interfered to blazen them forth by a series of stupendous signs and wonders. He has not abandoned us to cold deductions of reason; he has actually infused distinct and abiding principles into our understandings, yea, and warm and holy affections into our hearts. He has given us the whole spiritual man, and the whole spiritual man he claims from us; not the maimed, not the sickly, not the deformed, but the entire, the vigorous, the upright, in all its members and proportions; even the new man fashioned after Jesus Christ, whom he hath given us, and not after the world, which he hath bidden us renounce. Assuredly if ever, if any how, if any where, man was without excuse for spiritual ignorance, it is in these latter days, under this prodigality of Revelation, and in this Church of Christ.

The moral blessings of a Revelation have appeared in the course of our argument; but equally great also are the intellectual. In every department of knowledge there is a point of exceeding self-gratulation and delight, as well as of enjoyment of mental power; and that is, when we have arrived through the detail of the several parts to a full comprehension of the whole. It is faintly imagined by the delight of the traveller, who, having long threaded the different roads, explored the various towns and villages, followed the different streams of a country, surveys them afterwards as one great whole, combined into one view, from the commanding summit of a mountain. He then sees the bearings which had before perplexed his ignorance, and in one glance, and in one moment of time, summons before him what he had hitherto gradually and painfully explored in detail. He feels as if he had risen in his rank of being.

But in the corresponding case of spiritual knowledge, we do not only survey a delicious land of promise from a spiritual Pisgah,—we do not only from a lofty mountain, in company with our Lord, see all the kingdoms of the spiritual world, and the glory of them, but we have mounted far above the region of doubt and perplexity; we stand upon a rock, and that rock is Christ,—a position immovable, eternal.

Let us not, therefore, O brethren and partners in the Revelation of Christ Jesus, neglect so great salvation. In refusing it, think ye that we shall have refused once only, which is a sin sufficiently great, or twice only, which is a sin more fearful still? O no! we shall have refused thrice, and what shall save us then, what further means shall renew us to repentance then? For thrice hath God, by his merciful intervention with fallen man, delivered his Revelation upon earth. Once in Paradise, again from Mount Sinai, and lastly from Mount Calvary. Happy the forgetful Heathen, happy the rejecting Jew, compared with the heedless Christian. With fear and trembling, then, at our responsibility; with joy and gratitude for the gift; with faith and hope in his promises, let us accept in heart and mind his blessed word; reckoning the knowledge of this the only wisdom,—the practice of its doctrines the only virtue,—the delight of acquiring the graces thence derived the only joy,—the calm and serenity which it inspires the only peace,—the affections which it moulds and creates the only love,—the reward which it offers the only prize,—the way which it points out the only road to everlasting life. So help us, Almighty God, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

DISSERTATION II.

ON THE ORIGIN AND CONSTITUTION OF THE CHURCH OF GOD.

But ye are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, to the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly of the church of the first-born, which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel.—Heb. xii. 22—24.

THE term "Church," or "Assembly of the Lord," is taken in several meanings, more or less restricted; they are, however, all reducible under one general definition, which is, "an assembly of creatures united in the worship of God, according to his expressed will:" hence from the first moment of the creation of a class of rational beings, to whom God had signified his will, the Church of God commenced; and at the instant before the fall of man, it comprehended the innumerable company of angels in heaven, and our first parents upon earth. All were then true and lively members, all possessed with the same spirit: the will of God, being the will of all his creatures, bound them into one perfect society; flesh was in unity with the spirit, the outward and the inward man were the same, and old and new were terms inapplicable alike to body and to mind. But from that sad hour a woful change began, which broke into fragments all this lovely harmony: the will of man was no longer the will of God; accordingly, he was separated from this spiritual society, cut off from the communion of angels. God, however, by his special intervention, again revealing his will to man, under his altered circumstances, the Church was re-established upon earth. But now, since the will and the profession were but too often distinct, it had also its distinction of visible and invisible; the latter alone being that which maintained any real connexion with the spiritual society of heaven, and being united with it, in proportion as the will of the regenerated man approached to the will of the original innocent man: thus the Church of God, under the peculiar title of militant upon earth, commenced a new career. Alas, the sad distinction implied in this title! She was now set apart from the Church in heaven, and alas, its too pregnant meaning! for she was now to be militant in a long and almost desperate warfare against sin and death, and the banded powers of hell, made insolent and resolute by their newly achieved victory. From the moment of her dethronement from heaven, she has been clad as a penitent in sackcloth; for her crown of glory, she has had the sprinkling of dust and ashes on her shorn head; for robes of peace and righteousness, she has been laden ~~with~~ the armour of battle; for the joyous song of uninterrupted thanksgiving, of the acknowledgment of unbounded bliss from a holy incorrupt heart, she has had a new song put into her mouth, the mournful elegy of confession of sinful unworthiness, of acknowledgment of the justice of God's chastisement, of deprecation of his wrath and vengeance: instead of innocence she has repentance, instead of enjoyment she is presented with hope. Reduced to this sad change of condition, she is now sojourning with all her sons, as in a pilgrimage, in these realms below, wearied and to be wearied continually, almost unto fainting; yea, sometimes brought even unto death's door, awaiting in all patience and hope, that hour when the forfeit of death shall have been paid by all her children at the resurrection of the dead, and the Holy Spirit of God shall once again enter upon undivided, undisputed possession of our minds and bodies, breathing into them perfect innocence and everlasting life; and men and angels, once again joined in close communion, shall glorify their Creator, singing the song of redemption in the blood of the Lamb, evermore, world without end.

In proceeding to consider the Church under this restricted sense, we must revert to the circumstances of the fall. The sum of the sad change wrought in man's moral nature was, that his will was no longer the will of God. He now knew evil, and did evil; discontent with his present condition, uncontroulable appetites, overweening pride and ambition, utter perplexity upon the attributes of God, thenceforward took possession of him. His eyes indeed were opened; he knew more than he did before; but not, alas, of heavenly things, but of the powers of hell, the existence of which God had hitherto kept secret from him: once he knew but of angels, but now of devils also: from the spiritual he at once became a natural man. He was now without God in the world, and, notwithstanding his stiff-necked pride, yet his consciousness of the degradation of sin, his sense of irretrievable loss, his assurance of everlasting death, (into all which we cannot with any sympathy enter, never having tasted the contrast of innocence and immortality,) these would overwhelm his mind with all the agony of fruitless remorse, with all the hard-hearted recklessness of despair. He was an utter castaway from God. Such was his state when he was met by God, with the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. Intending to explain this promise in the next discourse, I shall here take for granted, that it implies an eventual restoration to his former bliss and purity by means of a Saviour, who was to rise from among his own seed. Under this view of it, coupled with the circumstances under which it was given, we shall discover the revelation of all those points which we saw, in the last discourse, were necessary to be revealed to the natural man, before he could have any apprehension of heavenly things.

First of all: he of course retained from his previous state, all his knowledge of God as the Creator and sustainer of the universe.

Secondly: his sentence of death and assurance of restoration unveiled the attributes of God, as moral governor of the universe, affording him the most signal instance of all which the world has ever seen, (except in our blessed Lord,) both of his justice and of his mercy.

Thirdly: the promise of restoration to a being just fallen from a state of immortality, could be nothing else than an assurance of a life to come everlasting, and in the same body, in which he had enjoyed his previous immortality.

Fourthly: the forgiveness of sins is evidently conveyed here.

Fifthly: the assistance of God's grace is clearly implied on comparing the circumstances of the whole transaction.

These communications on the part of God will demand, and call forth, corresponding qualities on the part of man; which will be, repentance, on receiving the inestimable and unexpected forgiveness of God, with resolution of amendment. As remorse is the offspring of despair, so is this quality of Hope and Faith, by which alone he could lay hold of that hope, and heartily accept the promise, and maintain his assurance of its performance.

And since it is by these two qualities that he lays hold of the promise of the bliss to come, he will consider the exhibition of them and their fruits, that is, holiness of life, requisite to its final attainment. But man's relation has been entirely changed by this offer of God, so that if everlasting death was his lot before, it will not be so now: and therefore, inasmuch as his acceptance meets with everlasting happiness, so will his rejection with its co-ordinate, everlasting misery. Thus is deduced a state of future retribution.

Thus the Church of God, commencing at the fall, contains all the fundamental articles, the maintaining of which, distinguishing the spiritual from the natural man, has been required by it, and will be required by it throughout all ages. But this Church was to consist, not of two cotemporary individuals, but of successive companies of men; hence ordinances will be required to regulate the pure transmission of its creed. By means of these, man will renew his memory, and God will repeat his assurances. They are—

First: Prophecy, originating in this promise, and carrying it on through successive ages.

Secondly: Sacrifice, which is indeed prophecy in a bodily shape, being a vivid representation of what was to come. We encounter this rite as soon as we are introduced to the sons of Adam.

Thirdly: the observation of the Sabbath, being the only remnant of the Church of Paradise. This would be a stated season for sacrifice, and thus transmit the original revelation.

Such then are the articles, and such the ordinances common and necessary to the universal Church of all ages, down from Adam until now. But as all flow from the promise of God made to him, and as this promise is renewed from time to time by means of prophecy, expanding ever as the period of fulfilment draws nigh, it is evident that both the creed and the ordinances of the Church will also extend. In this view the duration of the Church is first of all divisible into two great periods, the one comprising the winding up of the fundamental prophecy, the other containing the unravelling of the same: these are termed by the Jewish prophets the former and latter days,—as preceding or succeeding the main point of accomplishment,—and are as distinct as the dark and enlightened hemispheres of our globe. But the former period admits of a sub-division, made by the solemn renewal of the original promise, by the special interference of God in covenant with Abraham and his children, which was finally sealed on Mount Sinai. Hence there are altogether three periods, essentially distinct from each other, in which the Church is respectively denominated the Patriarchal, the Jewish, and the Christian. As the fall of man begins the first, and his restoration opens the third, the second commences with an intermediate state of constraint and tutelage, as of one who had abused the range and liberty which had been allowed him, and required strong discipline before he was again set free to enjoy the full liberty of the Gospel. In the first, man is admitted to the light of spiritual things, but they are faint and distant. In the second, he contemplates them through the medium of gross and sensible representations; in the third, this intervening veil is removed, and he sees them no longer distant, but face to face: to trace the successive development of the creed and constitution of the Church through the several stages, is the object of this investigation. But the present discourse will be confined to considering the Church as a society. The Church of God being an assembly of men united in the worship of God according to his revealed will, unity is the essential property of this Church; and it is evident that this unity must be both spiritual and bodily. We will first examine the spiritual.

The spiritual unity is twofold: a number of beings are considered as one, both in respect to community of nature, and to the common instrument producing such community; in other words, it is both essential and instrumental.

Now all mankind are essentially one by community of nature, derived from their general head and representative, the first man, Adam. But what a representative have we here? how can we, united under such a head, stand up before God for a moment, except for condemnation and death! For this Adam, in whom all mankind find unity, both clean and unclean, believer and unbeliever, must be the fallen ungenerated Adam, the Adam of sin and death; from whom deriving our unholiness, we are all corrupt, all degraded, all condemned, all denied access to God, cast away from the light of his presence, cut off from the comfort of his communion. If, therefore, we have recourse to our common father, it must be the spiritual Adam, the son of pardon and promise, gathered under whom we may approach God as justified and blessed. But neither is this sufficient. Believers are not thus summed up under one head. The Jew, who has inherited from Abraham a covenant so much more bounteous, will scarcely forego so great advantages to range himself by the side of those who are gathered under the more scanty privileges of Adam. The Christian, who has derived from his Saviour spiritual riches which had been hidden from mankind from the foundation of the world, will scarcely divest himself of these to place himself under Abraham as head, and still less under Adam. In this view, therefore, mankind, with respect to their means of appearing before God as one body, that is, as members of his Church, would be separated under three heads. We must go deeper then for our principle of unity. Now, although the person in whom each covenant is made be different in the above cases, the person who is the object of the promise of each covenant is all along the same; in him both Adam and Abraham, with all their children, have one and the same interest; in him, their Redeemer, all stand redeemed, and therefore holy and acceptable before God. Under the shelter of His wing of healing, who will gather us even as a hen gathereth her young chickens, we are all glad to crowd. Our essential unity then consists in all being one, under and in Christ Jesus, who is the second Adam, in whom we are, by regeneration, all one in our spiritual essence unto everlasting life and bliss; even as, by generation, we are all one in our natural essence in the first Adam, unto condemnation and death.

But how are all believers, from the foundation of the world, thus one in Christ Jesus? This will immediately appear from the consideration of the instrumental unity.

Our minds must for this purpose have in common some grand moving principle, which shall direct them all to one end, and fix them all upon one object. It is obvious, that none of the principles of this world will answer the purpose, for, were there no other objection, they all stop short at different stages in different minds. But neither will all the principles of the next world, love of God for instance. But it must be that principle to which all the rest are subordinate, which awakes them all, and gives all their final object. And this is faith in the Redeemer, who is the object of all promise; by this our spirits are all brought into unison: through this we all love, bless, and adore God, with the same love for the same blessing: by this we all join in laying hold of his gracious promises: by this we all become of one mind, and are also of one mind with Christ Jesus, and we are thus joined to our spiritual head as a well compacted body. By faith in Christ Jesus, says the apostle, (Gal. iii. 26.) we are all the children of God; all natural distinctions are done away; master and slave, Jew and Heathen, male and female, are all one in him. By this are united men of the most distant ages and countries; Adam with his latest descendant; the Patriarch who saw Christ in spirit, with the Apostle who saw him in the flesh; the Jew who looked forward to his coming, with the Christian who looks backward upon it; all are brethren of one another, and of him who is not ashamed to call us brethren. And however the view which faith upholds to the eyes of distant generations may vary in growing clearness and extent, still it is essentially the same, directed on to the same object, awakening the same hopes, and infusing the same holy principles.

But, on account of the variety just mentioned, which will affect its mode of expression, and its intermediate objects, we must be careful to distinguish between the fundamental articles of faith which unite men of all periods, and those which unite men of any particular period only. The narrow extent of belief required in one stage of the Church, would be infidelity in a later stage, to which revelation had come down cleared and amplified. Thus, while the faith is essentially the same, the notions of the character of the Redeemer, and the objects conveyed to the mind by the vehicles of prophecy and sacrifice, will differ both in clearness and number. The Redeemer may be expected to arise at some undetermined period from amidst the great body of mankind, and with faint notions of his attributes, as by the Patriarch: or may be looked for from the line of David, within a specified period, and with no obscure prospect of the manner in which he was to fulfil his high office, as by the spiritual Jew: or may be beheld as already come, with a clear and complete knowledge of his character and office, as by the Christian. Again; prophecy may limit the view to one grand spiritual object in prospect, as it did to the Patriarch: or take in a vast field of preparatory and collateral events, as in the case of the Jew: or have been accomplished in the grand end expected by them, and run on still further into the regions of time, with a long train of events, directed on to the consummation of all things, as it does to the Christian. Sacrifice may be offered by each person, at any place, as by the Patriarch: or may be limited to persons, place, and time, as with the Jew: and, as in both cases, may dimly pre-figure, though in the latter case by numerous and pointed types, what was to come: or, its types having been realized, it may give way to a rite commemorative of its realization, as with the Christian. The one great day in seven may be consecrated to the memory of the creation, as by the Patriarch: or may in addition commemorate a signal temporal deliverance, and rest from labour, as with the Jew: or may be set apart, changed to another day, for the celebration of the resurrection of our Lord, whereby was wrought a spiritual creation, a spiritual deliverance, a spiritual rest from labour, as with the Christian. In all these cases the main object of faith is the same. Yet did the Christian embrace no more objects in his belief than the Jew, nor the Jew than the Patriarch, they would each be guilty of apostacy. But the faith which unites men of one particular period must evidently be the same; must have the same clearness, the same number of objects, in short the same articles, the quantity of revelation being precisely the same; hence, while unity of faith cements the Church of all ages, unity of doctrine cements the Churches of the same age. And this unity is wrought by the word of God, which, being originally given by the Holy Spirit, is also maintained in all purity by the same, in the heart of the earnest hearer, whom the same Spirit hath brought to entertain it. Thus this blessed agent effects in the moral world an operation similar to that which he performed in the natural, brooding on the surface of the abyss of wild and stormy human passions, over the darkness of wayward imaginations, compelling by his energy into order and form the chaotic elements. He thus helpeth our infirmities, and, supplying quickness where the faculties are dull, candour where the mind is perverse, patience where it is hasty, humility where it is vain, docility where it is headstrong, purity where it is foul; removing thus the grand wall of partition between man and the truth, filling his heart with the spirit of Christ, he brings all men to be of one mind in Jesus Christ, so that all may be built up together into an habitation of God through the Spirit.

Being, therefore, one in Christ, and obtaining that union through faith in Christ, the true members of his Church form the company of the saints in light, are all redeemed, all sanctified, all glorified. In him they have a representative who can not only stand before the Father who dwelleth in unapproachable light, but is also one with him; thus have they sure access to God; and to him as its head, its king, its bridegroom, its shepherd, the Church as his body, his kingdom, his spouse, his flock, points all her operations. In him, preordained for the salvation of man before the foundations of the world, all that has been established in her since the world began, and will be established to the end of time, finds unity of purpose. Her prayers, her prophecies, her sacrifices, her oblations and thanksgivings, are all pointed towards him: her consolations and her censures are in his name; her tribulations are endured for his sake; her joys and triumphs are in his victory; and, finally, his are all her members, in heart and mind, word and deed, in the life present and in the life to come. Such is the spiritual unity of the Church of God; to this, as an accident to substance, as body to soul, appertains the bodily unity, which we have now to consider.

As the visible Church is a society of men, to whose eyes spirit is indiscernible except by effects understood in the body, they obviously require for spiritual unity an assurance from signs in the body, and those signs will be either conventional or necessary; the former are passive forms to which we are obliged to have recourse in order to regulate place and time and mode of worship, and afford a mutual expression of our minds; the latter are active qualities, exhibited in our moral conduct, being the fruits of the spirit, and therefore testifying to our neighbour every hour, by word or deed, to our being of the fellowship of the company of saints. There can be no comparison between the respective value of these two classes of signs. Is it not then most humiliating to us, that all the anxieties of the great body of the members of the visible Church, should have been directed to the former, which are in themselves quite indifferent, which give no proof of the sincerity of the inward man; and that they should have overlooked the latter, which are of vital interest, and cannot (at least for any length of time) be counterfeited!

With regard to the first, since our consent in their use is intended to designate the consent of our minds before God, and satisfy one another that we present ourselves before him, bound together in the bonds of faith, hope, and charity, it is evident that their foundation must lie in mutual charity; yet this, alas! is the very quality which of all others has been most neglected in the case of these outward forms, both by the imposer of them, and by the imposed. It is indeed a case of exceeding delicacy to draw every possible cord of love and unity, so as to bring our spirits into the most complete concord, and at the same time to beware lest, by drawing too many and too tightly, the outward signs may express much more than the inward substance can correspond to. With regard to the former of these cases, I will venture to suggest a distinction which seems to have been but little attended to. A reformed Church stands in very peculiar circumstances: the very increase of the primitive Church, both as it spread among nations, and shot upward into the higher ranks of society, would call for some addition of forms and ordinances; and these have been conveyed into every quarter of the world, and there continue, notwithstanding that the purity of doctrine which accompanied them has long been most wofully defiled. Any one of these corrupt Churches then which sought to return to her ancient purity of faith, and, in consonance with that also, to remodel her system of rites and discipline, will not narrow her views to the nation wherein is her dwelling-place; but equally long-sighted and long-suffering, combining the wisdom of the serpent with the gentleness of the dove, she will look also to her sister Churches still benighted, and retain, were it but for charity's sake, those rites and ordinances which they received together with purity of faith. She thus avoids giving a needless shock to the learned and candid members of those Churches, (and indeed, also of her own,) and keeps open a door to perfect union, as soon as ever they shall divest themselves of hurtful or needless superfluities. And if such Church be that of a nation, to which God hath committed exceeding power and influence among mankind, still more is she bound in charity to pursue this conduct, in proportion to the conspicuous station she must necessarily hold. All this should be diligently kept in view by her own members, who should bear in mind that things which seem, at best, indifferent, when she is considered individually, are any thing but indifferent when she is regarded as a part of the great whole of the visible Church of Christ. With this comprehensive charity, with this patient looking forward to a most desirable end, acted the reformers of our Church; nor have the fortunes of our nation been such as to justify us in contracting either one or the other. But, on the other hand, in the latter of these cases, these signs will have an undue estimation, will encumber and hide spirit with body, essence with matter; an humble means will be mistaken for a glorious end; agreement in lifeless forms will be substituted for agreement in purity of life, resulting from agreement in faith; and thus the imposer will put together in his visible communion, nothing better than a deformed lifeless corpse, presenting the stillness of death, not the calmness of life; the union of mere adjacent masses of flesh, not the body instinct in every part with spirit, and, instead of bringing the bonds of the Church, which are faith, hope, and charity, upon the world, will bring the bonds of the world, which are lust and power, upon the Church. Let us, however, in guarding against a system which presses all points, beware also of that which presses none; while we shrink from a superstitious reverence for bodily form, avoid also an affectation of spirituality beyond the limits of our bodily nature; while we shake off the yoke thrown on our necks by lust of power, spurn also that easy Epicurean accommodation which results from indifference to good, and connivance at evil; for if the one be destructive of charity by the compulsion to which it resorts, so is the other equally, by denying its only source, a pure and humble faith.

With regard to the second class, they make a separation between those whom the former would keep united. These are they which distinguish the member of the invisible Church, while the former mark but the member of the visible. These proceed from the spirit, and so appear in the flesh, and are therefore continual and abiding in it, like the signs of the inward soul, which never quit the living body; while the others are mere outward affections, which may occasionally be absent, and may be present even in a dead body. These have ever set apart the member of the society of God's Church from the member of the society of this world; by these was Abel set apart from Cain, Shem from Ham, the true Israelite from the false Israelite, the true Christian from the false Christian; these signify to believers that their spirits are in unity by possession of the same Holy Spirit, poured into their hearts; these give us confidence in each other, connect our mutual actions, supply the means of our mutual intercourse. As the virtues in the society of the world, such are these graces in that of the Church. Now such signs must manifestly become more numerous as Revelation expands; for it must thus gradually supply more and more principles on which we must act; it must thus take in continually a greater number of the incidents of daily life; until, in its full expansion under Christ, it hath swept into its net the whole of our conversation on earth, taken us captive in soul and body, and brought into subjection the entire man, in all his thoughts and movements. In this our last stage of the Church, so hath the gap widened between it and the world, that their societies are removed as far asunder as the rich man and Lazarus: yea, farther; they are as distinct as their respective heads, as the fallen natural man and he who hath blended God and man in one person. Our light is now no longer faintly reflected from types, no longer dimly struggles through the veil of prophecy, falling but obscurely here and there upon our practice. It is poured out upon it in a full bright stream from the fountain of life itself, so that not a point is left unilluminated. Hence every act of ours will manifest this heavenly source, and become a sign. And these signs we must be continually exhibiting, as children of light, to each other, assuring each other of our fellow-feeling, and thus bringing our spirits into union, as members under their great head. What shall we think now of those who assert that a man's religion is a mere affair between himself and his Maker? Is not this a most deplorable error; is it less than a virtual denial of Christ? A man cannot live and give no signs of life. But we, whenever we meet with a brother, must be ready with our sign; and where two or three are met together, not for prayer alone, they must so conduct themselves as if their common head were among them. They will refrain from evil words, and address themselves to good in conversation; they will maintain good faith in mutual dealing, and show themselves possessed by the same spirit, and to be one in the same head and lord, Jesus Christ. Our Saviour has expressed by many lively parables, his intimate union with the society over which he presides. He has termed himself the bridegroom. This body, then, to which he has been married, must be one with him; every member also of it one with him; must have one course of action, one mind, one interest, one end; must love and hate, cherish and reject, hope and fear, the same thing. He has called himself the vine, of which himself is the main trunk, his followers the branches. Means he not here that they are all parts and portions of himself; that from him they derive, as branches from the trunk, their sap, draw all their stream of spiritual nourishment, their very inmost and vital principle of thought, word and deed, and to him, in the duly appointed season, by various channels of works of love to fellow branches, return it; that from him is all their bloom and beauty of holiness, their leaves, their flower, and their fruit? And does he not lead us to conclude from these two similitudes, that whoever is not intimately united with him, is divorced, according to the one, as being unfaithful, cut off, according to the other, as being unsound? Moreover, he is the shepherd, of whom, if one of the flock lose sight, he is lost in the wilderness: he is the way, from which whoever turns aside loses the only road to everlasting life: he is the door, through which alone is the entrance into the city of eternal joy. If thus intimate be our union with Christ; if thus our spirit, in all its thoughts and designs, must conspire with his spirit; if thus every act of our life must be referable to our union with him, and in him with one another, how can we possibly, unless we be indeed none of his, cease from exhibiting to our neighbours, from root through stem to topmost branch, the proofs of the indwelling sap of life, the signs and marks of our profession? Such is the Church of God, gathered from all ages and nations under one head, informed by one spirit, united in faith and works, in substance and sign, holy, entire, without rent, or spot, or wrinkle.

But now, perhaps, it may be asked of me, where is this Church of Christ? of the first class of signs of its existence we see indeed enough, and too often much more than enough. But these, it is confessed, may exist in the body after the spirit hath fled. But where is the other class of signs, which alone can assure us of its having life among us? On the moment of raising our heads from the perusal of this description, and looking at the broad Christian world before us, we see nothing corresponding. On the contrary, we behold its surface like the plan of a city which has been razed by war, or overthrown by a hurricane, broken up into shapeless detached heaps; we see its fair region here darkened with debasing superstition, there involved in the still deeper gloom of demoralizing infidelity. We see no trace of unity under a common head, but counsels equally devoid of holiness and of unity of purpose, cold-blooded interest and hot-blooded passion, maintaining their jar of unceasing discord. So that we are at a loss how to refute from facts the assertion of the freethinker, who maintains that religion has nothing to do between man and man, and considers it as nothing more than a business between him and his Maker; that is, an abstracted contemplation. Again, if we turn our eyes back upon the records of the past, we are still surveying the same sad picture, hearing the same doleful tragedy, which palls by a repetition of the same heart-rending scenes, of the same mournful accents, of the same wretched catastrophe. We must repeat, therefore, our question, "Where is this Church of Christ?"

Brethren, the question is indeed humiliating; it may well indeed put us to shame, but it need not put us to silence. It may well put us to shame, for what can be a greater reproach upon us than that our abuse of God's most precious gift should bring doubts upon the reality of the gift itself. But it will not put us to silence, for it is founded upon a superficial view and shallow reflection. We will even help the objector with his charges. We will remind him that at the time of the flood this Church had dwindled down to a single family; that again it increased, but again to dwindle, like a precious plant in a foreign unkindly soil: that, even when the children of Abraham darkened with their numbers the plenteous land of God's accomplished promise, there were left but seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal: that the general aspect of Christendom at this day is mournful and perplexing. What then? God is just, and man is unjust; God hath offered, but man hath rejected; God hath given, but man hath abused; so that were not a vestige of the Church to be traced, God is justified. But neither has man, by God's grace, been so entirely wanting. There are signs, many and manifest, of Christ's true Church dwelling among us, which occur to all who will not close their eyes, if these objectors will but look for the Church militant, and not for the Church triumphant. The former, even in the most painfully selected body of its holiest members, must ever disclose much human infirmity; how were it otherwise militant? Fallen man, however regenerated, can never exemplify, in this life, a perfect model of a son of God; he is ever attaining, but never having attained; how then shall a body be perfect, each of whose members is imperfect? The signs, therefore, exhibited by a perseverance in the struggle to attain, are they which mark the true member of the Church of Christ, and assure its existence among us. And if such seem so very rare, it is partly owing to the sort of company by which the objector is likely to be surrounded, and partly also to the very unobtrusiveness of good men. The straws and the feathers keep the surface of the water, the pearls and gems are in the depths below; the vices and crimes of the children of this world attract the eyes and fill the mouth of the world; holiness is theirs who are not of this world, and are, therefore, overlooked by it, and unrecorded. But supposing the number of those who exhibit the required signs to be less than it really is, what scandal and stone of offence would this be to him who has been told from the mouth of the great Head himself, that his real Church upon earth shall ever be a remnant until the fulness of the time come; that many are called, but few are chosen; who feels assured that, wherever two or three are met to join their spirits in his name, there his true Church is brightly visible, there the glory of the Lord, as in his temple, is shining, and never shall be done away.

But however full of offence the appearance presented by God's Church upon earth may be to the fool, it is overflowing with instruction to the wise. It humbles him indeed, but it is in order to exalt him; it warns him, but in the same moment it cheers him. For he there sees the body of his own infirmities most painfully reflected and multiplied, as through glass, into innumerable images. He is led from this view to examine with a more severe probe, and with a more intimate knowledge of human failings, his own bosom; he detects there weaknesses and elements of weaknesses of which he was formerly unsuspicious. He traces a connexion between his own failings and the disgrace of that society which ought to be holy, even as its head is holy. Therefore he will more than ever deplore his own sinfulness, which has contributed its share to the general shame; he will mourn that the spirit of men should thus be ever at war with the spirit of God, and will humble himself even to the dust. But, at the same time, in a consciousness of spiritual improvement, through God's grace, he will see its honour and glory; there is holiness in it; and every step which he makes in advance supplies him with a joyful earnest of those blessed days, when, like a faithful spouse of Christ, the Church shall put on her crown of pure gold, and stand in her white raiment all glorious, without spot or wrinkle. At every point of progress he has a joyful earnest, assuring him that God's promises are accomplishing, though not yet accomplished; that the serpent's head hath been bruised individually and potentially, though not generally and actually: that the desire of nations hath been offered to all, although not received by all: the conqueror of sin and death has been set upon his throne, although all his enemies be not as yet put underneath his footstool. Thus with his growth in spirit grows also in his mind the beauty of the holiness of the Church of God, and however at variance be its model as presented to his eye of spirit, with the form which meets his eye of flesh; however squalid may appear the one after the glorious brightness of the other, he is neither offended, nor does he despair. He has a witness within him which bids him look onward in patience and unshaken faith to the end; he feels in his bosom the elements of the bliss which shall accompany the final union of the two, and they shall once again be blended, never by a second fall to be rent asunder. For then shall the reign of Satan have been accomplished, then shall his deceits and wiles have been overcome, then shall the partition-wall of sin and delusion be broken down, and all hearts shall be open, all desires known. Then all the children of God being of one mind, possessed with one and the same spirit, united in every thought and turn of thought, filled with the love of the Father, abounding in the grace of the Son, and enjoying the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, shall form the congregation of the first-born, of the spirits of just men made perfect, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, the company of innumerable angels.

Brethren, we may say with the beloved apostle, "it is the last time;" perils and trials are at hand, and the arm of the heaven-commissioned thresher seems already uplifted, in order to descend with a blow which shall separate the chaff and the wheat. But no gloominess of times, no overflowings of ungodliness dismay us; rather more abundant be our hope, more unshaken our faith, for the time of our redemption draweth nigh. God's chastisement must try his children, and usher in the joyfulness of the inheritance which shall be theirs who abide the trial; therefore let us cast aside all misgiving, attach ourselves to all well-doing, and, above all, exercise that charity, which, in trying times, is so grievously wounded. For in proportion as, under the influence of God's holy Spirit, we can agree with our neighbour in thought, word, and deed, in the same do we realize upon earth the Church of God; in the same do we approach to the blissfulness of his Church in heaven; in the same do we grow up to the standard of fellow-citizens of the saints, of members of the household of God. All this worketh that faith which we found on the merits of our Redeemer; that hope of everlasting life which we cherish in him who rose from the dead, and that charity with which we love one another, because he first loved us. Such faith, such hope, such charity, may he give unto us, and maintain in us by his Spirit, that we may be all one in Christ, who is one with the Father.

DISSERTATION III.

ON PROPHECY.

I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope.—Psalm cxxx. 5.

The Word of God is not like the word of man, and for estimating the former we shall obtain but little aid from any consideration of the latter. They both communicate certain ideas to men, and there ends their similitude; in all other respects our estimate would be more safely formed according to the rule of contraries. For as this latter goes forth too often without sense or design, or at best, and however premeditated, to a temporary purpose, that proceeds from God's eternal immutable counsel, and passes on to eternity. This is essentially extinct from the moment in which it has been uttered, and when we say it lives, (as in the memory of man,) we are fully aware that we are using a figure which is literally inapplicable. All it can do is, like some worthless insects, to give birth to a fact, and then die as it were in the labour. But the word of God liveth for ever: it waits for no agent, and the fact to which it gives birth depends upon it, and upon it alone, for the continuance of the principle of life: by it were the worlds created, and by it they are sustained; by it empires rise and fall in their appointed seasons; in it all which goes before is comprehended, and held in union with all which goes after, and eternity is connected with eternity. The word of man taken into the heart will too often defile and overcloud the soul; the word of God received there is the only principle of holiness, and is a lantern to the feet. The word of man is often bitter; the word of God is sweet to the taste, yea, sweeter than honey to the mouth. The word of man is too often weak, powerless, blunt, and unpointed, unable to penetrate beyond the ear, and reach the mind. But the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. The word of man is too often, as proceeding from an unholy bosom, faithless; and as coming from one who has no power over fortune, never sure. But the word of God is true, and sure altogether. Therefore it is, as the Psalmist says, the cause of certain hope to every mind in which it is received.

The Word of God, thus eternal, steadfast, holy, powerful, issued forth ever to the same merciful end of man's redemption, may be considered as having a two-fold operation on his mind. It will either hold forward continually to view the glorious end of that redemption, referring him by the way, as time proceeds, to certain intermediate events to come at certain destined periods as its harbingers, and thus maintaining in him a sure and certain hope in the end, and by what has been fulfilled, giving a pledge of that which remains to be fulfilled: or it will give him instructions how to conduct himself, so that he might be a partaker in the blessedness of that end, exalting his thoughts, chastening his affections, and directing his understanding; thus it will be either prophetical or doctrinal. It is intended to discuss it now under the first of these two heads.

The Word of God, as far as the Church which we are considering is immediately concerned, first came to Adam upon his fall; and it could come to him but for two ends, namely, either to finally pronounce upon him the sentence of death, with which he had been previously threatened, or to modify that sentence according to God's good pleasure. The first is plainly implied in the words "dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." But the death expected by Adam must have been eternal death, and this admits of a modification by being changed into temporary; this latter being actually the case, the only passage in which we have to seek it is in that promise, "that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head;" which, though addressed to the serpent, yet, as being solemnly recorded in God's written word, we cannot but regard as a promise made to all mankind in the presence of Adam. Considering the solemn occasion on which it was made, when the head of all mankind, the chief and representative of millions of living souls, was standing arraigned for judgment upon himself and his posterity, when he was tortured with agonies of guilt and despair, which were not only new to him, not only in deepest contrast to his former innocence and bliss, but also must have for these reasons far exceeded any pangs undergone by the most wretched of his posterity,—surely it is impossible to understand its expressions literally; surely thus they would be unworthy of the occasion, and appear to Adam a cruel banter, a mockery of his depth of woe. We are driven therefore to a spiritual sense, and in this we shall find the modification sought

Before the foundation of the world Jesus Christ was foreordained for the salvation of man. Every thing, therefore, communicated by God to man, must terminate in him. Can we imagine then that the very first intervention of God with man, after he fell into the need of salvation, and at a moment when beyond any other he must have felt that need, at a moment when beyond any other he must have given himself up to utter recklessness of despair, that this should have passed off without a hint of so great consolation, and that he, the head of mankind, should be deprived of that comfort which has been so freely imparted to his posterity? Without some communication of this kind, how could religion either have begun or maintained itself upon earth; what reason would God have to complain of the wickedness of man at the time of the flood, and how could such characters as Abel, Enoch, and Noah have ever existed? Surely God's signal vengeance on that occasion argues the abuse of something imparted since the fall; and the existence of such characters argues the use of something communicated since that hour of hopelessness. Why, too, should God have maintained Adam a single moment upon earth after the pronouncing of his sentence, if there were nothing further? He could have had no delight in the ineffable misery of his creature prolonged for such a period! We cannot, therefore, suppose Adam to have been left without that consolation, which we ourselves, who have never experienced the horrid consciousness of the contrast of our state with perfect innocence and bliss, yet find absolutely necessary to our patient endurance of existence. Neither can we suppose so important a communication on so important an occasion, to have been omitted by Holy Writ. If the sentence has been recorded by which we were all, in our general head and representative, condemned to death, surely it would not neglect to notice the promise by which, in the same general head and representative, we were all restored to life. But if it be not implied in this passage, it is nowhere. It must be, therefore, implied in this passage.

The sense, therefore, in which Adam understood it, would be this—that one should hereafter arise from his seed, who should triumph over the power of Satan, to which he himself had yielded: that he was himself, with all his posterity, to share the fruits of this victory (otherwise what consolation had it been?)—and as his own defeat wrought his fall, so the triumph of that promised one would correspondingly work his restoration?

That such a sense but obscurely glimmers through the express words to our mental sight, needs form no great difficulty, if we will only consider the peculiar circumstances of Adam. The great obscurity to us lies in the personification of the evil spirit by the serpent. Here it is easy to conceive that he would have no difficulty, so differently circumstanced was he who had gone through the whole transaction as a chief actor in it, from us to whom so brief an account has come after many ages. But besides that he was furnished with all the illustrating facts,—I should rather say was most deeply impressed with them in heart and understanding, so that he could not but readily apply the words of the prophecy,—his attention had never been distracted, and its powers weakened, as ours have been, by such variety of incidents. This was the first event, as it were, in his life; he could have had no previous change or degree of bliss or woe to call his attention; all its powers, therefore, were concentrated upon this fact, to a degree much exceeding what we can bestow upon one of the most vital interest. Nothing can befall us so important as to affect us to a degree approaching to what he felt; and even our greatest calamities find us already tolerably broken in, and prepared to support them. Besides, his clearness of understanding (wreck as it was of perfection) must unquestionably have been superior to that of ours, which have never known the uncloudedness of innocence, but are clogged with the grossness of long-transmitted guilt; and therefore, supposing even all things else the same, what is obscure to us might have brought no perplexity to him. Again, while he was at that moment in circumstances which would give their peculiar point to the words uttered to him, his despair, felt for the first time, and intense far beyond any with which we can be affected, would be more alive to discern the first glimmering of hope. If we have seen it, in our experience, so quick in catching the first ray of comfort, and in gathering a warmth from a light so feeble as to be quite indiscernible to others less concerned, what may we imagine to have been his quickness of apprehension, his eagerness of grasp? Can we then, in fine, wonder that the most spiritual man, the wisest man, the most unhappy man, placed in circumstances into which, with the liveliest picturing of our imagination, we can scarcely gain an insight, surrounded by relations into which, with all our vigour of understanding, we can barely penetrate,—that he should have discerned a meaning where we are baulked with perplexity?

There intervenes no other prophecy between this and the promise made to Abraham "that in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed." This therefore sufficed for the consolation of the Patriarchal church. Nor was it, if we consider the circumstances, insufficient to that end. For the life of Adam himself was extended through nearly one-half of the duration of this church down to Abraham, and the life of Noah alone fills up to within one hundred and thirty years the interval between his death and Abraham's birth. Thus the prophecy came down to the last faithful member of that church with little diminution either of its interest or clearness. But circumstances are very much changed when we come to the Jewish period; not only are we come to the short duration of man's life, which has remained ever since, and therefore made tradition a much more precarious channel of knowledge, but by this time the church is confined to a narrow portion of earth; therefore man would require assurance against the many untoward chances to which it was thus exposed. The promise of the Redeemer was limited not only to a nation, but progressively to a single family of that nation: hence the stability of the nation and of the family must be assured. On these accounts prophecy would both be more frequent and also more particular.

With regard to frequency, it is singular that down from Moses to Ezra there passes by not a single generation without the accomplishment of some prophecy delivered by Moses and his successors. So completely did God provide for keeping up a faith in his promises, and exhort them to look to the end in steadfast hope.

On the ground of particularity, we are here presented with a new feature; not only is the great end of all more plainly discovered, but a train of events leading on to it is foretold, and prophecy thus takes into account a large mass of things temporal; by this connexion the end becomes palpable, as it were: it is no longer the mere promise which it was before, for each of the above events forms a substantial earnest of its performance. The Jew can keep it steadily in sight, knowing its exact direction, and as he proceeds, being able to estimate its very distance, guided on as he is by a spangled line of stars of glorious lustre, and of unchangeable positions, the fates of kingdoms and empires of this world, of Nineveh, of Tyre, of Babylon, of Damascus, earthly as they are, become to him spiritual beacons, and fall, as it were, into that numerous class of bodily types by which the eyes of this babe were allured on to spiritual realities. This series of prophecies, varying of course in circumstances as the end drew nearer, may be divided into three stages.

The first, extending from Moses to David, has a peculiar character from prophecy, being mostly applied to facts isolated and at no great distance, as Nathan's with regard to Absalom's revolt; and it is remarkable that God's special intervention is very far more frequently and signally called forth in this stage than in the following. All this we may expect from the circumstances of the period, in which the nation had not obtained a complete settlement in the land until the end. It required, therefore, amidst its tumultuous and unsteady fortunes, continued and particular assurances of God's help and protection.

The next period reaches to the captivity; and in this prophecy takes both a longer and wider range, and for the most part goes on directly towards the end. In this we have the denunciations against Babylon and Tyre, and in this the kingdom of Messiah is painted in glowing colours, and brought so near to the eye that even the most dull and desponding must take heart at the sight: meanwhile God's special intervention is rare and at long intervals. All this is in accordance with the circumstances of the period: the nation had been completely established in the land, and therefore a vast accession of confidence had accrued to God's promises; he had given such an earnest that there could be no excuse for doubt; the nation, too, as now settled, had leisure to look to the end; and to that end, as the monarchy declined and evil times came on, they would gaze more and more intently; and from the blessed end God's word was removing all the apparently insuperable obstacles intervening; the fall of their enemies was pronounced, and if their captivity drew near, not to the eye of the prophet only, but of the common man, yet the song of man's deliverance pierced beyond the gloom, and assured the end in despite of the thick veil of sorrow which intervened.

The third period, if we except the deliverance of the prophet Daniel and his companions, exhibited before a foreign people, is destitute of God's special intervention. But prophecy assumes a more decisive tone, and her song grows much more comprehensive; the nation was now either in captivity, or in all the feebleness of its restoration; but at the same time the great end was coming fast into sight; the interval then was spread over by a golden network, as it were, of prophecy, visibly connecting the present and future. We now meet, for the first time, with a train of prophecy; that is, with a period of time foretold, with all its divisions, by critical events pointed out, and the whole and its parts adjusted to chronological dates; thus the very year of the Messiah's coming was pointed out, his character still more clearly marked, and the last strain of prophecy which resounded in the Jewish church rose with an impetuous bound, so as far to overleap its previous limits, and to alight amid the glories and the wonders of the Christian church.

The Christian period opens with the accomplishment of the original promise, which was the key note to all others; a Redeemer has actually arisen from the seed of Adam, of Abraham, of Judah, of David. As far as they looked for, the end of the world is come. But to us the world begins anew, as with a second Adam; and through this second Adam we have a fresh promise given, that his Church shall remain upon earth until his second coming again to put the final consummation to all things. Here then, as in the two previous dispensations, we have an original promise to be carried on by prophecy, and the whole interval may be divided into two periods.

The first contains that short but momentous time when the church, as in the first period of the Jewish, was wandering, as it were, in the desert, and had obtained no settlement in the land; when it was yet but appearing in bright sprinkles here and there, like dew upon the thirsty sands of the Heathen world. The first promise had been made through the first Adam, in a season of extreme sorrow and humiliation; and, in a similar season was made the second promise, through the second Adam. This period, then, like the corresponding Jewish, is full of God's special intervention by signs and wonders, full also of prophecy. But prophecy is not continued beyond it; the last strain comes from the last surviving apostle; hence the prophecy of this period is not only particular and applying to events close at hand, as that of Agabus, but also runs on in a train so as to reach to the end of all, as in the prophecy of the 1260 years; so that this period answers to the three first of the Jewish. In the second period, God's special intervention has ceased, prophecy is silent. The church was now firmly settled; a store of prophecy had already been laid in, a vast store had also been accomplished by the time of the final destruction of Jerusalem: every thing, therefore, was assured. There was no need then of a line of prophets; this period, therefore, resembles that which ensues after the third Jewish, only the certainty which renders a line of prophets needless, rests on different grounds. The end is as far off as in the first Jewish period. But then he in whom all previous prophecy has found its fulfilment, and who, therefore, gives us the surest pledge possible, he has given us a prophecy both of himself immediately, and a long train of prophecy through his beloved apostle mediately. Nothing, therefore, in the church calls for further messages from God. But as long as she is supplied with a succession of faithful men, fit conservators and interpreters of the deposit already made, (and such he assures us that there shall ever be,) so long has the church all the substantial benefits of a line of prophets.

Such is prophecy relative to mankind in the general. We now come to consider its effects upon man individually. These may be considered as three-fold. Man will be comforted, will be warned, and will be proved by prophecy.

The two first effects are co-ordinate, beginning together from the first, and ever after associated. Sentence of death was pronounced on our first parents, in that same intervention of God in which he promised their final restoration. And we have all inherited the one together with the other. Every individual since that moment, however spiritually regenerated, may be considered under a two-fold view. With regard to the remaining (and, in this our state, inevitable) infirmities of the flesh, he is the old man condemned to death, with all its necessary attendance of pain and trouble, bodily and mental. But with regard to the power of the spirit, he is the new man, restored to everlasting life. In this latter capacity, therefore, apprehending the sure word of God, he applies it to soothe all the fears and perplexities, or to pull down all the presumption, between which his frail mortal nature may be fluctuating, according to the aspect of the world before him. God's threats fill him with humiliation and awe, and tell him that he is dust, and to dust shall return. They assure him that he shall be dealt with after his sins, and rewarded after his iniquities. They proclaim that the Lord is jealous, the Lord revengeth, and is furious. They bid him seek righteousness, seek meekness, so that it may be that he shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger. But his comfort binds up his heart, bruised and broken by worldly afflictions, encourages him to exclaim, "Art thou not from everlasting, O Lord my God, mine Holy One? We shall not die:" and promises that his warfare shall be accomplished, and his iniquity pardoned. Accordingly, every dispensation, beginning with that given to Adam, has opened with a combination of denunciation and consolation. If in one hand it has held forth to man the cup of joy and salvation, in the other it has also presented the cup of fury and of trembling. In the very address of Moses, in which, not long before his death, he concluded the covenant between God and the children of Israel, what a fearful mixture of threats with promises! Their utter ruin is predicted, together with the coming of the expected Redeemer. The harbinger of the Gospel proclaimed repentance for the remission of sins, and told men, that while God would gather the wheat into his garner, he would burn the chaff with unquenchable fire. And the blessed Preacher himself, our Lord and Redeemer, hath promised tribulation and sorrow, even to the inheritors of everlasting life; and while from his own mouth, and also from the lips of his beloved disciple, he hath assured the everlasting endurance of the church, and the victory of his saints, he is full of severe denunciations against particular churches and individuals, who shall be guilty of disobedience. And how full of warning have these come down to us! From their ashes, still smoking, those churches are crying out to us at this day, telling of wrath and judgment to come; and from their very graves individuals are raising a warning voice against opportunities slighted, gifts rejected, and talents misapplied. In every period, therefore, of the church, if adversity have its comfort, so has prosperity its warning.

In prosperous times, men are too apt to be engrossed with the enjoyments of this life, and their attention is too much drawn away from the bliss of the life to come. But even when they address themselves to such a consideration, it is in such unison with their cheerful feelings, that very general terms are sufficient to convey God's promise of the future happiness. The mind, surrounded with images of bliss, needs not a list of particulars to strengthen its belief or hopes. All is warm and full of heat, and a few sparks are sufficient to kindle a blaze. Hence, prophecy passes over such times, with but just so much addition of particulars as shall suffice to carry it on in due and gradual expansion. But in disastrous times, men's minds are unstrung, their hearts are cold, their understandings are darkened with doubt and perplexity, their affections are overcome with terror and apprehension. General terms of comfort will not now suffice; men cannot hold and cling to them: they now want particulars; they want detailed circumstances, which they may oppose to the detail of misery which surrounds them whithersoever they turn the eye of flesh. They want to contrast a deliverer with a subjugator; an everlasting kingdom, with a falling empire; partners in light and bliss, with companions in pain and woe; unlimited happiness, with dreary prolongation of misery; a time appointed, and resting-place for the sole of their feet, with the wretched uncertainty by which they are distracted; characters of goodness and mercy, with those of cruelty and vice, by which they are oppressed. They, in short, want a bright side to each of the appalling objects around; they wish each dark and threatening cloud to be at least edged with light, in order that they may be convinced that the sun still exists, and that day shall return on the morrow, if not to-day; they wish to behold angels of light combating against each of those foul fiends which disturb their peace. Therefore it was that, as the times grew darker to the Jewish Church, prophecy grew more particular, until in the end, amid all the fearful signs of approaching downfall, amid the abomination of desolation, amid the abandonment of God's visible presence among them, declared by the blazing temple, amid the humiliation and despair of the captivity of princes and people, amid the pitiable feebleness and helplessness of their restoration, amid all the horrid discordant sounds attending this sad procession of events, was heard an uninterrupted strain of the song of prophecy, which would not be put to silence, but waxing louder and louder, like the trumpet of God, rose higher and higher, with thrilling and heart-stirring notes, above the deafening din of temporal calamity. It was, likewise, from his prison, amid the weakness and persecution of the infant church, that the beloved disciple of the Lord sang forth, expanding into all its particularities his general promise, that his church should not fail, and announcing all the glorious facts of its victories and triumphs.

In both prosperous and disastrous times, men require to be warned; for in both they are naturally reckless. In the one they cry out, "Soul, thou hast many goods laid up for many years: take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." (Luke, xii. 19.) In the other they say, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." It were needless to instance the solemn warnings given to the sons of Israel, and which we may consider as addressed to ourselves also, under similar circumstances, with, however, this additional weight, that having been verified once, they are of all things most certain to take place again, wherever their application is called for. These, therefore, are our warning prophets too; and our preachers delivering forth their solemn admonitions, expounding to us their awful fulfilment, and applying them to our own times and circumstances, public or private, are an unfailing body of prophets, to whom, if we listen not, neither will we, though one of the prophets of old rose from the dead. And not only have we these among ourselves, but there hath visited us a preacher such as never preached to a reckless world before, on repentance and judgment to come, since the days of Noah; a preacher who bears the signs of his commission stamped upon the man, both in body and in mind; a preacher who, like Adam, can speak from experience of the sorrows of ruin and degradation; a preacher who has been preaching ever since the Church of Christ upon earth began, and shall preach until the end draw nigh. What? Is there indeed a corner of Christendom unpenetrated by that mysterious stranger, who, bearing in his peculiar features the lineaments of Abraham, and thus at a glance announcing to us from what high estate he hath fallen; cherishing in his spirit all the sullen pride of ruined greatness; exhibiting in his dealings all the caution and timidity of the despised stranger; attracting, by his attachment to the carnalities of his abrogated law, continued mockery and derision; moving, by his superstition, his obstinacy, and his blindness, the pity of some, the contempt of others, the neglect of all; deprived even of the only ordained assurance of pardon by being denied all means of sacrifice; and holding in his hand the word of God, without a spirit to understand it;—is there, indeed, any church in Christendom, before which the Jew, this awful monitor, has never appeared? Oh! his prophetical character seems to cling to him still; every where he appears as God's herald to warn against disobedience, to proclaim his judgments; and wherever he appears, there should be, as in the presence of the prophets of old, humiliation and awe. Thus doth this preacher, traversing daily Christ's kingdom, unceasingly admonish churches and individuals; and, standing in our luxurious cities, should be to us as Jonah amid Nineveh, summoning us to repentance and mourning.

The word of God, once gone forth, never returns to him void; it abides for ever among us, and generation after generation finds it still stronger from past fulfilment, and still widening in extent of application. Were the threats thrown out against Ephesus, Laodicea, and the rest of their company, accomplished in them alone? have they found no object since? has their fiery indignation found no fuel, and become extinct? Where then is Edessa, where is Alexandria, where is Carthage, those bright and burning lights of Christendom in their day? Where are they indeed! It would be more easy to discover the ruins of Carthage, than to detect a fragment of her church. And have these threats terminated here, or are they not rather confronting the churches of this day, ready to hunt down as noble game as before? Are they not prophecies more awful than ever, more sure from fulfilment, more terribly significant from the melancholy detail by which they have already been repeatedly illustrated and verified? Doubly and trebly have we been warned compared with our predecessors; shall we then by an equal length of resistance meet with but an equal punishment, or not rather suffer in proportion to our full insight into the meaning, and our experience of the certain consequences of the neglect of the admonition?

The proving of our hearts by prophecy is intimately connected with its comfort and its warning. We shall show our faith, and manifest our obedience according as we accept it, to minister to our hopes and fears. If God's sure promise cannot avail to raise our fainting hearts in tribulation, nor to subdue their pride, and turn them unto him in our hours of prosperity, we are none of his: we have been weighed and found wanting; we have been proved, and have come out dross. But there remains a further proof, applicable to us at all times, and not the less sure, because we are not aware at the moment that we are under trial; not the less searching, because our hearts are open in all their unsuspiciousness, and we have not time to shut them before our visiter has entered, and all our secrets have been revealed. Do we, in our study of these oracles of God, keep in view the prime object of feeding a growing faith by observing where they have been accomplished; of creating and nursing in our hearts a cheerful and unshaken confidence in his protection, an entire devotion to his majesty, his power, and his truth, so that we may be found with our loins girded, and lights burning, in the day of his visitation; and thus do we look forward with a godly hope, and the earnest expectation of the faithful creature; or do we go to the perusal with a vain curiosity, with that vulgar propensity of restless man, which sent him of old to the oracle, to the auspices, to the diviner; for thus have men before now turned the pure word of God into an astrologer's almanack, and even into an impostor's credentials? It is highly necessary to distinguish these different motives, because such critical periods, as that in which we are living, are peculiarly apt to call them all into action, even in one and the same bosom; and according as they predominate is the judgment of our trial. Let us, therefore, endeavour to detect this lurking enemy of the truth, so that we may be enabled to eject him from our bosoms.

Let us try our hearts, and seek there the impression which is made upon it by the engrossing events of the times in which we are living: does it, in a sure and certain faith, in the end, say, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done," accepting equally joy and sorrow, looking to the completion of all prophecy to be accomplished on earth, with the same tranquillity and steadiness as we do to its final completion in heaven, when this mortality shall have put on immortality, and this corruption put on incorruption? Is the sorrow swallowed up in the contemplation of the bliss to come? Is the joy chastened as an earnest of everlasting spiritual blessedness? Again, let us inquire of our understanding. Does it cautiously beware of mistaking the nearness of events for magnitude, their interest to ourselves for importance to the Church of Christ; acknowledging that its limited powers can never ascertain their real importance, even in a political light, until long after they have passed, and dragged in their train a number of pregnant consequences; how much less then, in a prophetical light, where the view must be extended to an end far, very far, beyond the most acute and intent gaze of the earthly politician? Do we eject thus both from heart and head all minor considerations; reckon, under this view, the Church of Christ our only country—its triumphs our only interest? Assuredly if we indulge in any more narrow contemplation, if we exert not this catholicity of feeling, our error will be little less gross than that of the Jew, whom national pride and worldly considerations rendered utterly blind to the real end of the prophecies vouchsafed to his church; and we shall be driven to despair by those calamities which usher in the triumphs of the church, even as the fight precedes the victory. Our eye of flesh shall look upon earth, and behold trouble, and darkness, and dimness of anguish; and our carnal heart, seeing all its proud hopes laid low, the cherished signs of the Lord's coming all falsified, will, like that of the Jew, turn away in unbelief from the real heralds of his advent. Such heralds are already in the world, and one of the most obvious is the communication existing, and still increasing, both in extent and intensity, between all the sons of Adam, divided though they be by sea and by land, by tongues and by customs. They are again once more gathering to a common head. Even our own lifetime suffices to see a manifest increase here: almost daily the widening prospect takes in at least a nook hitherto unexplored by sight; and every nook is an hour or a day embodied, as it were, and visibly taken from the delay of our Lord's coming. In looking with hope and joy on such a prospect, we cannot err: there is nothing in its widening extent which can nourish a carnal feeling; for it is obvious that such extent, if it be due to peace, and commerce, and good will amongst men, is also equally owing to wars, ruined empires, subjugated nations—to pestilence, to famine, and to the sword. Having received our sign from God, let us, like his prophets, be content with it; let us see, in faithful hope, the day of our Lord, and be glad. Palpable, though undeveloped, events are in our possession; we hold in our hands, as it were, the baby Jesus, and with our dying breath we may cry, "Lord! now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Helpless may the Church of Christ appear at darker moments, helpless even as seemed that babe; it may have to endure spiteful mockings, to be a sign to be rejected, yea, may be nailed to the cross. But upon all this the eye of faith will look without a shrinking of doubt or dismay, and will continue to look to the end, while every carnal eye shall long have been averted in perplexity, disappointment, and disbelief. Even at such a moment, perhaps, when men's hearts are failing them from fear, when the strong are bearing up through faith against the burden of calamitous days, when the weak are desponding, when the apostate is triumphant; even then, in the midst of the fiery trial, that prophecy of the 1260 years, so much the concern of our days, which has been shifted by expounders continually to and fro over the range of history, shall all at once, with a noise of thunder, snap into its place, and every part and joint find its proper position and coincidence; all become symmetrical and clear, to the refutation of the infidel, the confirmation of the doubtful, the triumph of the believer. Glorious and heart-moving is the view which God hath given unto the Christian Church by his word of prophecy, uttered since the world began; the future hope of the Patriarch and the Jew, is our past and assured certainty. To them this word came in various ways, at various times; uttered now and then, and here and there; detached, progressive. But to us all has settled into one continuous whole; and comparing ourselves with the Jew, we are men, indeed, compared with children, for we see the tendency of all that discipline, and all those tasks, which he obeyed, not from his understanding, but because it was the will of his schoolmaster. Instead of looking forward with idle curiosity, let us fix our eyes upon this magnificent spectacle of prophecy, and filling our hearts with the holy feelings of joy and thankfulness, and appreciation of God's majesty, which it should excite, then carry on our eyes in lowly and cheerful hope to the end. A view hitherto denied to man has been revealed to us, and blessed are our eyes which have seen things denied to the sight of Adam, of Abraham, and of David. Jew, indeed, after Jew saw the progress of God's promises, but still at the best he was ascending within the tower of God's temple, catching but through occasional loopholes the sights and sounds from without. But we are they who stand upon the summit of that tower, and looking down on pinnacles and turrets, buttresses, and foundations of that glorious fabric, see them all conspiring in grand and terrific harmony.

Finally, my brethren, let us learn to look to the end from a right understanding of the beginning: so shall we look forward in faith, in joy, and not in vain curiosity and hankering; so shall we have grace to do our duties with all steadiness and single-mindedness in our own sphere and days, that, if at any time the appearance of the world shall say, in signs not to be misunderstood, that the Lord is coming quickly, we may joyfully exclaim, in answer, with his beloved and prophetic disciple, "Even so! come, Lord Jesus!" Thus may our loins be girded about, and lights burning, as men that wait for their Lord; for the Son of man cometh at an hour that we think not.

DISSERTATION IV.

ON SCRIPTURE.

Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or our epistle.—2 Thess. ii. 15.

We have already shown how the fundamental points of God's word were revealed to his Church from the first. The accessions made to it by successive revelations will appear as we examine severally its articles; meanwhile an important consideration calls for our attention. This is the means which God hath appointed for its sure transmission from generation to generation, and the use we are bound to make of such an instrument of knowledge.

There was nothing in the patriarchal stage which required the committing of God's word to writing, (supposing that art to have been then known,) whether we regard the quantity of revelation, or the number of persons through whom it had to pass, or the circumstances of its preachers. The quantity, as we have seen, depended upon the original promise made to Adam, combined with the peculiar circumstances under which he received it. Now, both these he himself continued declaring to the world for 900 years, and between him and Abraham (to whom the promise was renewed with still greater clearness) occur but two successions, namely, of Methuselah and Shem.* The circumstances of its preachers were peculiar indeed: for when has the world heard such a preacher as the first Adam, if we except the second Adam, to whom he bears, in many points, a singular relation, arising from his having been the corrupter where our Lord was the restorer. For, first of all, he only (with this exception) came to his hearers from a former state of bliss and innocence: how vivid and heart-stirring, then, must have been his setting forth of the happiness and glory promised hereafter; what conviction must have impressed his hearers, who listened to one who had actually known by experience what he stated, and not drawn upon the aspirations of a fervid imagination. He only, too, (with the same exception) knew from personal experience the extremes of exultation and abasement; knew to all its extent the degradation of sin and death, and tasted the cup of human agony to the very dregs. He alone (with the same exception) could sympathize with the infirmities of all mankind, for in him they all had their spring; he was father, not only of their bodies, but, alas! of all the sins and pains of those bodies. How passionate, how powerful, must have been his preaching to the inheritors of his own self-procured sinfulness and death. How affectionate his exhortation, both as natural and spiritual father, to resist that plague which he himself had brought upon them. How deep, how edifying, must have been his penitence. How lively his thankfulness to God, his pardoner; how joyful his hope in a Redeemer; how profound his humility; how impressive, therefore, his example, which must thus have borne to the conduct of his hearers, somewhat of that relation which our Lord's bears to ours. It bore testimony to his revelation. How unweariedly watchful must have been his care over that flock, that he might bring into the fold of eternal life the sheep whom his own sin had scattered and driven astray. How intimate, too, must have been his knowledge of the human breast: he, indeed, knew what was in the heart of man, but it was as his corrupter, and not as his maker; it was as having tasted perfect innocence before he fell into guilt, and not from the omniscience of divine purity. Finally, his very presence gave evidence to his doctrine: it was to his hearers what the written word is to us, together with all the proofs, collateral and posterior, of its authenticity. The sixth part of a man's life of those days did not elapse between him and Noah, the preacher of righteousness. And when between the first and second Adam arose a greater preacher than he, unweariedly in the earlier part of his ministry warning men of the wrath and judgment to come, and during the latter part setting forth the dreadful accomplishment of God's justice? If Adam could tell of the bliss of Paradise, and stir up his descendants to struggle and regain that bliss in a world to come everlasting, so Noah could speak of the horrors of the flood, and entreat his posterity to beware of the final judgment of the life hereafter. Thus both the mercy of God, and the justice of God, were preached in the Patriarchal Church, with a power, and under circumstances, which rendered quite unnecessary any commission of the word to writing. In Abraham the original promise is both confirmed, amplified, and defined: the Redeemer is to spring from his seed, and a new intervention of God, with an enlargement of his mercy, has now to be handed down to his posterity. But so shortened is human life, that such tradition could not go far without corruption. After, therefore, repeating his covenant with Isaac and Jacob, God put the finishing crown to it in his communication with Moses, caused the law to be registered in writing, and Holy Scripture, (in the strict sense of the word,) commenced, after three intervening successions* from Abraham, and six from Adam. But it is necessary to bear in mind that this law, which in all its provisions, civil and religious, peculiarly regarded the abode of the favoured family in the land of promise, did not take the place of the creed of the patriarchal revelation, but only surrounded it as a vineyard with a hedge, to protect it from the devastation of the superstition without. The ordinances are put upon a more settled footing; the doctrines, if not expressed, yet lie in it in such a manner, that, supposing them to be once known, their places are immediately found.† The whole faith, therefore, of the Patriarchal Church, existing at the time of the delivery of the law, must have existed ever after. But that nothing may be wanting, God maintained a continual succession of prophets, who, as they taught, appealed perpetually to these doctrines, and if these appear to be expressed more clearly, and to grow in number towards the end of the Jewish dispensation, it is not because they only now began to be entertained, (as some paradoxical theorists would have it,) but because prophecy became, from circumstances already referred to, so much more abundant in quantity, and also, from growing infidelity, so much more didactic in its nature. The very fact, too, which all divines allow, of the later prophecies hinting these doctrines, shows that they were addressed to a people to whom they were familiar. Thus the word of God came to the Jew most abundantly indeed. It came to him by tradition from his fathers, which was farther maintained by the teaching of the prophets, and hinting of the law; it came to him by direct precepts from the moral part of the law; it came to him reflected from innumerable points of the ceremonial law; and all this in such a manner, that a desire of knowledge was sure to be rewarded with knowledge, and increase to earn increase. Even the most inert portion of it, its straightest and yet most unnecessary injunctions, had its effect. When the spiritual-minded man compared this with the aspirations which had been raised in him by that portion which bore spiritual interpretation, he felt an inexpressible yearning after something better; he discerned a designed incompleteness; he was conscious of being in tutelage. Every reading of the law thus supplied him with elements of thought, which carried him on far beyond the point at which it ceased to speak openly: it hinted most abundantly, but fulfilled most scantily. Hence he was continually led on to the spirituality of the glorious promises made in Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and looked out for the redemption and the life to come.

* Methuselah was cotemporary with Adam, 243 years; Shem with Methuselah, 97 years; Abraham with Shem, 50 years.

* Jacob, Levi, Amram.

† Thus the article of the resurrection of the dead, lies in Exod. iii. 15, as shown by our Lord. Matt. xxii. 32.

But now to the Christian all this imperfection has become perfection; the obstacle of carnal ordinances has been removed, and unlimited range is given to the spirit. All that the Patriarch dimly sought in prospect, all that the Jew doubtfully handled through the veils of type and prophecy, all has been supplied, and more than the heart of man could have contemplated and desired; the flood-gates are burst with the abundance of the stream, yea, all the windows of heaven have been opened, and the whole earth is covered with the waters of life. The word of God, consigned to writing by the apostles of our Lord, and their disciples, hath come down to us, and will go down beyond us to remotest ages, delivered to successive generations by a faithful succession of members of his church, the existence of which he has assured to us for ever. Having received a gift so inestimable in itself, so wonderfully provided too with the means of transmission, let us with grateful hearts search into its riches, and learn to apply to our use its exceeding benefits.

For this purpose we will first consider Scripture as a book of knowledge, and compare it with the most instructive and interesting of the different classes of the writings of men.

I. Since it applies to our morals, teaching us our duties, let us compare it with a work of this nature. Let us, then, take up such a book, the most perfect let it be which the unevangelized mind of man is capable of producing. Let us go through it, comparing sentence with sentence, investigating its principles, proving its arguments, imbibing all its knowledge, and possessing ourselves to the utmost of its spirit. Let us rise up from it with a mind exalted far beyond its former pitch, and burning with a desire to put into practice that to which both heart and head have given so devotedly their sanction; and when we come into the world of practice, alas! is not the intoxicating dream soon over? Do we not feel deceived, deluded, and our high notions supplanted by an angry feeling, as if we had been imposed upon, or by the despondency of disappointment. For on the very threshold we are encountered with obstacles which had never been calculated upon, and find, both in ourselves and others, infirmities of which we had but slight, if any, notice; and a depth of corruption, of which but the surface had been presented. Above all, we want an immovable ground of principle; we want the pervading spirit of which the virtues which were recommended are the body: for not only are those virtues opposed, but their very foundation, such as it is, is too slight to withstand the attack. It is battered, it reels, it falls; and, with it all the proud towering fabric reared upon it, of vain-glorious virtue, comes with a crash to the ground. The only foundation is faith in God, and the only book which can supply this is the word of God: that book comes from him to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, who knows all our infirmities, and hath sounded all the depths of our corruption; who hath fashioned us behind and before, and from whom no secret can be hidden. Informed with his word, we are informed with his spirit, by which that word was dictated; we have his grace infused upon our hearts, so that we draw thence not only the will and desire to do, but the wisdom and power also. It forewarns us of all our infirmities, points out all our dangers, and sends us into action prepared to encounter the worst which can befall. We are, by the real view of our infirmities, humbled in order to be exalted; whereas that deluding book of human wisdom exalted but in order to humble. The word of men's wisdom moved us, by a number of unconnected principles, as a dead body may be put into motion by application to its different members; but the word of God is the spirit of life within, which gives motion to every part of the living body. So different is this book from a book of moral precept, in which rank half-believers are so fond of considering it.

II. Since the word of God commands and forbids, let us next compare it with a code of laws. Now in the case of all human codes, a law may be learned, and we need no' refer to it again; and indeed its principal laws are known and obeyed by the great majority without having seen the written code at all, but they have learned them from their conversation with the society which is founded upon them. But can this be done with any part of Scripture? Let us take the most legal part of it, the decalogue; will any one, who has ever reflected upon the nature of its all-seeing Giver, assert that any one commandment there comes to him with the one unvaried meaning (which it is the virtue of a human law to have) which is expressed by the outward letter? Does he not rather feel that the searcher of all hearts, who forbids murder, (for instance,) forbids also, by that same commandment, all thought and feeling which by any possibility may ultimately lead to it; and that therefore the most gentle, the most innocent, the most charitable among us, may recite this commandment every day of his life, and find in it fresh application to himself, and cry out on God for pardon for the past, and grace for the future? From human law we learn what to do, and what not to do; but from divine law also what to think, and what not to think. Doing requires a particular occasion; thinking is always at hand, always to be regulated, and therefore the law of God at every moment applicable, and to be appealed to. But if such be the case with the legal and comparatively carnal part of God's word, that we must have it ever in our hands, being required to be our own judges, that we may not be judged, (while we leave the exact knowledge of human laws entirely to the magistrates appointed to administer them,) what shall we say to the spiritual part? what to the Gospel? This is addressed to the most secret and inward part of man; in order fully to obtain its light we must bare to it the inmost recesses of our hearts: and who, with the longest life, and most uninterrupted habit of self-examination, ever arrived at its bottom? Who, then, but a madman would talk of a single reference, or of a second-hand knowledge, as sufficient here. And yet this is but half of the instruction laid out for us by the Gospel, which not only helps us to search the spirit of man, but also informs us of the spirit of God; and who hath ever fathomed that depth?—still more, who shall combine the knowledge of the two, and bring every turn and winding of his own spirit under cognizance of that unsearchable spirit? No son of man is able; but every son of man, as having a spirit hereafter to be judged by that spirit, must do this to the utmost of his ability, and anticipate, as far as in him lies, the judgment of the last day; therefore must God's written word be continually in his hand, that it may be written progressively on his heart. So far does it differ from a code of human law.

III. Since God's word contains a history of his church, and especially of its divine founder, let us compare it with a history.

In the reading of history, however amused and instructed, and even interested, we may be, yet. considered with regard to our individual welfare, we are but little concerned. Let it even be the history of our country, let our own forefathers be amongst the most celebrated names, let our own native spot be the scene of some of its grandest events; we lay down the volume indeed with a glow perhaps of enthusiasm and personal vanity, but we never take it up again but for occasional reference, or for particular passages, or to refresh memory by a rapid glance of the eye, or to indulge the abovementioned passion;—we never read it carefully over and over again, compare passages, weigh sentences, with the interest of one who could learn his own fate from it. Nay, let even this history be one of grand and critical events, which not only bear a great resemblance to those which are passing before our eyes, but also have evidently given birth to them, so that we can trace an unbroken chain from one to the other; still we do not feel individually affected, but merely as members of general society. Having obtained a clear knowledge of the events, and drawn our deductions, we close the book with a consciousness of access to our knowledge no doubt, and with a renewed interest with regard to the aspect of our own times; and we may recur often to it, as a new light reflected from other portions of history, or from passing events, clears up any portion, or throws it into glowing relief; still the feeling amounts to little more than curiosity: we perhaps strongly or jocularly express our sentiments by calling it the book of fate. Yet is this only politically speaking: we do not really feel our fortunes suspended upon those events, nor consider our individual welfare of body and mind as flowing from them; consequently in this, as in the former case, the first reading, if it be not the last also, is the only thorough reading: and however we may improve our information by further recurrence, yet at no time is either the interest of that vivid force, or the knowledge of that practical nature, such as to have any sensible influence upon moments not dedicated to the especial contemplation of such a subject.

But let us now take up the word of God, the history of the kingdom of heaven. Every event here is one of a grand and brilliant series, tending to our own salvation. The actors in them are God the Father and his blessed Son, and men, our spiritual forefathers, whom death, instead of dividing from us, unites. The public events, even of the most worldly complexion,—as the rise and fall of cities and empires, of Tyre, of Babylon, and of Persia,—as recorded there, all visibly bear to the establishment of the kingdom of Christ's gospel upon earth, are seen at this moment in their blessed effects upon us and around us, and can be traced tending onward still to brilliant points of merciful dispensation beyond us, both as to place and time. The private events are chiefly those which conduct our Saviour to his cross, give continual occasion to words from his mouth of inexpressible comfort, of peace and joy to every earnest reader, and contain those sufferings which perfected him as a high priest appointed to offer up an atonement for our sins. Thus our own salvation is the continual theme, the means of it the continual lesson. And it is the salvation, not of the body, or things of the body, of which the mind intently engaged in any study never thinks, but of that immortal part, which, while we read, we feel within us weighing and discerning the spirit of the words, and trembling or exulting at their import; of that part which we feel indeed and alone to be ourselves, from which we are conscious that we never can be separated, now or hereafter. This book, proceeding from the spirit of God, meets our spirit with his spirit; and what end can there be, what satiety of instruction and enjoyment, in such a communion? Neither the first nor the hundredth and first perusal will satisfy. It is a book for life.

IV. We may also consider the word of God as the biography of a friend, who laid down his life for us; as the testament of a friend bequeathing us inestimable and everlasting treasures; as the letter of a friend from a distant land, to which we ourselves must one day go. Under this and every other view in which we can possibly place it, we shall find it an object of continual study. The more we look at it, the more it expands. Some fresh quality of mercy, some new channel of grace, some uncontemplated importance of fact suggests itself at each perusal; and innumerable are the modes of joy and sorrow, endless their combinations, which we thence derive: of sorrow for the sufferings of our deliverer,—of sorrow for own sinfulness to which those sufferings were due; but of joy for our Redeemer's return to life and glory, and joy for our deliverance thereby so wonderfully accomplished.

So different, so inappreciably superior is this book to every other,—and so different, so inexpressibly more ardent and persevering must be our study of it. And now, let us ask of ourselves, is it thus studied? Alas! but by one or two here and there; and they will confess that their ardour and perseverance is far below what they are conscious it should be, and that they never can hope to realize, however they may, and will to the last endeavour, the notion and plan which they have set before them. But do we even hear it talked of as every book of general and powerful interest is talked of. Is it a book which even the indolent and superficial betake themselves to, because it is so common, that ignorance upon it is disgraceful? Alas! neither is it so. It is a book, the mention of which is studiously shunned in general society; it is a book of which the world will plead ignorance without a blush. Various are the causes of this treatment. It requires much study, and most men will give but little to any book; its subject is spiritual, and most men are natural. These are plain and obvious causes; but one cause there is not so obvious, but fully as efficacious, and therefore more insidiously besetting us: it is the notion that we are sufficiently acquainted with its contents already. The absurdity of such a notion has, I hope, appeared sufficiently from what has been just stated. But as its effects are grievously important, let us examine it more particularly.

Of what nature is the prevailing knowledge of the contents of this book? It is a loose, traditional information which floats about in society, obtained orally and not by reading, and known more from being at times unavoidably encountered, than by being ever purposely sought; its highest and purest source is nothing more than the attention which decency demands men to pay to public worship, and this operates but feebly. It mainly comes to men in the great traditional stream of modes and opinions, delivered down by one worldly generation to another; and thus reaches the pupil in the same channel with the law of the land, with the conventional usages of society, and other accompaniments which entirely strip God's word of its awful and peculiar distinction from man's, degrade its solemn character, and assign it a place scarcely above that of the established canons of society. Such a knowledge must be not only most imperfect, but erroneous also; but this is the very sort of knowledge which administers the most certain obstacle to all improvement or correction; this knowledge is adapted to man's corrupt inclinations, it satisfies, therefore, all his inquiries. To alter our notions is to confess ourselves in the wrong, and this our vanity will not allow; at the same time it requires exertion, and this our indolence will not endure: thus we cling to our ignorance, and in religion mistaking the familiarity of terms (which have been thrust on our ears whether we would or not,) for the meaning of them (which we have never taken the trouble to examine,) whisper in our careless and overweening spirit, before our teacher, perhaps, has opened his lips, "I know all that is going to be said already." This presumption of knowledge prevents too many from consulting the original at all, and they who carry the prejudices of imperfectly acquired, and therefore corrupt knowledge, to the reading of it, are beset with difficulties, which it requires great patience and exercise of good sense and judgment to surmount.

The great danger of a superficial reading in this case, is a confirmation rather than dissipation of previous errors. When we look at a building with a passing glance, it will often assume the features which we expect from some previous but inaccurate information, or are inclined to find: our senses have not time to contradict our notions or wishes; and the having seen it with our own eyes, convinces us more than ever of the accuracy of our original notion of it. So it is also with the mental eye, every thing is as we expect or wish to find it; we turn over the leaves in Scripture, see the same familiar terms, phrases, and facts, and shut the book with the satisfaction of having searched for ourselves, of having found ourselves moreover in the right, and are thus confirmed in our error. But as when we go up close to that building, and examine it long and intently, the whole appearance alters; magnitudes, places, proportions are changed, windows are found to be doors, chimnies to be towers, pillars to be buttresses, and in fact the very order of architecture different: so is it when we come to apply our minds closely upon Scripture,—all is changed. Those terms so familiar assume different senses, are beheld in a different connexion and bearing. This relation of the terms to each other, it is, which we must endeavour to comprehend every day with surer and wider grasp; from this alone can we gain the clear and sure understanding of the word, and be imbued with a deep and due sense of the awful meaning of its terms. Let us then, having opened the book, carry on our search with all the activity and perseverance which the investigation of truth demands from us erring mortals. Great indeed is the folly, and melancholy is the delusion, of satisfying ourselves with the mere familiarity to our ear and eye, of even the least important term (as it may seem to us) in the gospel. Every stone in a building, however magnificent the whole may be, is in itself commonplace and familiar; but as our eye carefully travels from it to its neighbours, we are led to survey the harmony and grandeur of the whole; and on returning to it, we are surprised to find that stone, hitherto thought so indifferent, filling some important position in the support or beauty of the entire building. Almost every day, on going forth from our doors in a large city, we encounter familiar faces; but unimportant as they may thus appear, did we inquire about such persons, we should find them perhaps filling, in their respective spheres, useful and necessary stations in the structure of the society by which we are surrounded. Such is also the difference in importance and meaning, with which the most familiar terms and passages of Scripture strike the person who had hitherto been content to take them as they were offered to him, but has now determined to ascertain their meaning for himself. And how happy has ever been the result. How many, thus seeking, have found that they had been familiar with an angel of God, with a prophet of the Most High, yet known them not any more than those two carnally-minded disciples did their Lord on the road to Emmaus. How many have discovered in those terms which they had carelessly heard, and still more carelessly, perhaps, employed, and discovered with a surprise of wholesome fear or joy,—here a messenger to repentance, there a monitor to obedience: here a minister of hope, there of dread: here a queller of his pride, there an encourager of his despondency: here a chastiser of the conscience and a prober of the heart, there a comforter to the spirit, and soother of his troubles.

Let us proceed to remove the veil which long familiarity has thrown over some of these terms, and see if their real features be indeed so insignificant, so uninspiring, so unappalling.

How familiar are the terms Salvation and Redemption to the ears of men; but have they ever called up together into their mind, and placed next to their hearts, the facts which are included under them,—man expelled from bliss, a world lost in iniquity, devoted to death, the Son of God appearing as a Redeemer from heaven, crucified for its sins, raised again for its justification; themselves, in particular, subject to the shame, and liable to the glory implied in all this cluster of heart-stirring facts? Men will speak of grace; but have they learned from the testimony of their own closely questioned hearts, gathered from well applied experience, and drawn from the instruction of Holy Writ, how much that is called in to repair? Have they followed with generous aspirations its glorious course through the characters exhibited in Scripture, from the first day of the spirit's visible descent upon the apostles, tracing its healing influence on the weakness and corruption of human nature? Have they examined its promises, its means, its objects, and sought by earnest prayer its effects upon themselves? They will speak of the atonement; but have they ever in their hearts leisurely confronted two beings face to face,—sinful, weak, mortal man, with holy, Almighty, everlasting God—and have they then tried to reach the height of the mercy, and sound the depth of the love which could draw cords of reconciliation between two such beings? They will use the term future retribution; but have they ever calmly looked in the face the tremendous aggregate of facts to which that term gives unity: Christ coming with his host of holy angels in the clouds of heaven, with the trump of God, to judge the quick and the dead, of all tongues, and of all ages; separating the crowd,—as Moses once the sea,—on his right hand and on his left, welcoming the one side to bliss, dismissing the other into everlasting punishment?

They will speak of our Lord's divinity. But have they ever traced him in that glorious attribute through the two covenants, blazing as the angel of the one with fearful signs and wonders; and going about humbly, as the minister of the other, doing good with miracles of mercy and love? Have they reflected how overwhelmingly awful this attribute renders what is already so awful; how it affects his rejection, his agony, his cross, and his grave; and how prominent in responsibility the Christian stands apart from the rest of mankind, for hence God is in a peculiar manner his master, God in a peculiar manner his judge? Such, when unveiled, is the aspect presented by but a few of the general terms of Scripture. And their meaning is such, we see, as must not come and go at man's will and bidding, but abide with him in his heart, being continually kept filled up to their full measure by frequent appeals to Scripture. Thus alone will they have due weight upon our understanding and affections. Otherwise with advancing years they will continually drop somewhat of their former fulness, make a slighter and slighter impression, gradually lose all power of affection, and finally sink into the most vague and unmeaning portion of the vocabulary.

Shall, then, any thing less than a serious and persevering study of this heavenly volume content us? Can we ever dispense with it? Only let us inspect our own bosoms. What infinite varieties and variations of sense and passion, what changes of shapes of thought, and all its innumerable combinations, are taking place there, within even a short interval,—within one glance, I may say,—of self-examination. Not for one moment is our frame of mind in one stay. Yet his word, who knew what was in the heart of man, has ever something wherewith to meet, correct, and turn to the best account, every one of these varieties. Can we, then, ever cease to need its application? As well may our body live without the vivifying soul, as our mind dispense with the life-giving spirit of Holy Scripture. Again, therefore, let me urge you to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest: above all, ascertain well your present state of knowledge of the word, nor be afraid to discover your ignorance; for as surely as the fear of God is the beginning of that wisdom which prompts us to obey him, so is the consciousness of our ignorance the beginning of that wisdom which leads us to know him; and having known him, to love him with that perfect love which casteth out fear. And now, finally, let me dismiss you with an appeal to that name which ye bear. Ye are called Christians. This term, so familiar as to be tossed about from one to another, bestowed indiscriminately on every one around us, nay, in many mouths, even synonymous with man, what does it imply? It implies the sworn soldier and servant of Him, who is God, Saviour, Priest, King, Prophet, Maker, and Judge of the world. In it is comprehended the extreme of earthly humiliation and of heavenly glory: in it we are reminded of man's fall and recovery, Satan's triumph and defeat, of the conquered powers of darkness, of the conquering powers of light, of the kingdom of God upon earth, and in the world to come everlasting. Keeping in sight this meaning of the title which ye bear, look into your own hearts, see their irresolution, rebelliousness, confliction of duty with passion, of spirit with flesh, of darkness with light, and fly to the remedy which God hath set before you, even his pure word. Let this title, coming on your ears, be a trumpet-call to duty, rousing all your spirit within you, as faithful soldiers of your heavenly Master. And thus, even thus, by knowledge, by goodness, by the armour of God on the right hand and on the left, may we have Christ abiding with us, ever by his precious word through his Holy Spirit, making us wise unto salvation.

DISSERTATION V.

ON SCRIPTURE.

Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word.—2 Trin. ii. 15.

The necessity of a continual study of Scripture, has appeared from its peculiar character as a book, in whatever class we choose to consider it. But this will appear still more clear on considering not merely its subject, but the manner in which that subject is treated. We shall find that there is a peculiarity in the arrangement of its matter in the holy volume, which will require a more particular study than would be necessary under other circumstances.

For this purpose let us only consider what is the nature of the most celebrated works which profess to teach us the duties of life. They are regular systems; precept is drawn regularly from precept, and all proceeds by an unbroken chain of reasoning, from some fundamental proposition. In this consists their excellence; but how unsuitable is all this to the purposes of life. Here, so far from meeting with any thing like system, every thing is a contradiction to it. We find ourselves in a wilderness of circumstances, between which the mind can, at the moment, trace no imaginable connection, amid a confused train of thoughts and passions, brought into play by unforeseen objects, without visible mutual influence, intermingled without rational order, exciting, without permanent effect. Can we wonder, therefore, at the slight dominion which such books, however admirable, have ever exercised upon practice; exhibiting, as they do, a regular chain of consequences which is never witnessed in real life; addressing themselves to that which is comparatively so little consulted—the understanding—and leaving entirely unaffected that grand and constant source of action, the heart: we may even go further, and assert, that as far as they do influence us, they throw the events of life, with which we daily come into close contact, to too great a distance, by making them subjects of theory, and thus lead us to speculate when we should be practising; and to think, when we should be feeling. The book which shall have a deep abiding practical influence on real life must reflect its image, must present that real mixture of facts, thoughts, and feelings, which is found to exist there, and while it does not neglect the proper appeals to the understanding, will hold prominently forward noble and influential motives to the heart;—such a book is Holy Scripture.

In this work the wisdom of God has consulted our weakness, which in those books it was the object of the pride of men to disallow. It would seem as if system had been purposely avoided. Of the two portions of which it consists, the one, the Gospels, is a narrative of facts, told as they occurred, which, as they arrest the attention, and challenge the understanding, in their important bearings, engage also the heart, incidentally, as it were, in the great stream of doctrine with which they are pervaded. The other, the Epistles, that great doctrinal storehouse, is composed of occasional letters, full of continual reference to facts, abounding with appeals to the affections, and so seldom indulging in any lengthened train of argument, that we are commonly left to gather the doctrine, by putting together what is there detached, and by supplying what was evidently pre-supposed. This provision of God's wisdom becomes still more apparent on turning to any of the regular systems of divinity. How cold, how formal, how unpractical they appear; yet the doctrine is precisely the same, having been drawn from its pages. It is the absence of facts, and artificial regularity of arrangement, which causes the difference. In the former case we were presented with real beings; our Lord and his apostles moved before our eyes; the doctrines came forth, as called by circumstances,—always interesting, oftentimes most heart-stirring,—from their mouths, or as illustrated with vivid beauty and truth in their behaviour. The doctrines were thus associated with facts, and made their impression on the heart with all the solidity of substance. We were presented not only with teachers, but with their hearers also. We listened to the one, we sympathized with the other. When our Saviour spoke, we stood amid the train of apostles and disciples; when St. Paul reproved the Corinthians, we were interested in their sorrow; when he commended them, we participated in their joy; when he advised Timothy, we joined with him in fearful and trembling responsibility. Every little fact, whether told directly out, or only disclosed by allusion, drew us into a nearer fellowship, giving additional substance of flesh to our conceptions, awakening our social feelings, and thus opening all the channels of the heart to the reception of the doctrine. But in the other case, our Lord becomes almost an abstract being; the goodly train of apostles, disciples, hearers, and assembled churches, vanishes at once; facts are excluded, and thus, while we have to follow the studied arrangement of the compiler, and are debarred from the interest of making our own inferences; our heart, at the same time, has scarcely any thing palpable presented to it.

This disposition of its matter will indeed require more attention; but, at the same time, the impression made is not only deep and lasting, but also sure and genuine: let us resort to an illustration. Suppose a figure, an image for instance, put into our hands, not entire, but in separate pieces, which are adjusted wisely to each other; when, after many trials and much study, we had put this together, should we not have a much more distinct and correct notion of it than if we had examined it ever so long entire? We now know clearly the relations of the different parts, with their proper proportions, so clearly, that were a fragment presented to us, as belonging to the figure, we could satisfy ourselves whether it did really so or not, and our memory retain steadily, and to our great satisfaction, that which our own labour has put together. Such is the result of having studied so as to make our own arrangement of the miscellaneous detail of Scripture. Having put all its separate parts together in our minds, its doctrines in our understanding, its feelings in our hearts, and thus spiritually framed in our breasts its entire configuration, we keep it by us permanently; and are, moreover, enabled at any moment to reject such false doctrine as the interested cunning of man may seek to impose upon us. We see at once its discrepancy; we know that there is no part to which it can be adapted. We will not argue on the doctrine itself, whether reasonable or otherwise; but we see that it is incongruous with the whole, and that is sufficient for its rejection. But supposing that what we have thus rejected, be proposed to one who has not thus studied Scripture for himself, but depends upon the aid of a system of divinity, well and clearly drawn out,—will he have the same ready discernment? He will not at the very outset, in all probability, have studied the system itself sufficiently; made out as it is to his hands, he will rely upon being able to lay his finger upon any part, when occasion calls, and not have the whole in his mind. In any case, he will not have the due comprehension of the bearing of the different parts to the one and only true shape; nor will the figure be filled up in all its parts, and unalterably fixed, but will flicker in his mind. Thus it will admit of incongruous additions, there is room for preposterous impertinences to intrude, and his faith is in jeopardy every hour. Under these circumstances, able and even honest men may be entangled in the subtleties of wily arguers, and receive for true what has been made to have to them the semblance of truth. But with the proper study of the original, men, unlearned in all other respects, may attain a stability of faith which shall be proof to any shock from false brethren without. So harmonious are the various relations of Scripture, so accordant with all his purest notions; so come in aid of all his serious wants, so adapt themselves to every turn of his mind, to every point of his understanding; so apply to all the affairs of life, that he has the firmest, the most unshaken conviction of its truth. It has completely adapted itself to his mind, become one with it, and partakes, therefore, of the certainty of its existence. No subtleties suggested by unbelievers will move him. As well may they propound to him Berkeley's objections to the existence of matter. Nor will he be less safe from the impositions of false teachers, whose doctrines he will quickly discern to be at variance with the truth. To the learned, who has to pursue the history of the Church of Christ after the apostolic period, it is absolutely necessary to have arrived thus at a decisive state of religious opinion, in order that he may discern whether what he reads is traceable to Scripture, whether they deform the original, or conform to it. This being the nature of the Holy Volume, it is plain that it requires qualities in its student in a higher degree than that in which they are commonly exercised upon other books. It must be read with more than common candour and sincerity, with more than common attention, with more than common perseverance.

We all know how a perverted mind distorts every thing to its own views in the perusal of writings, especially in such as are of a moral and historical cast. By a misrepresentation of some particulars, and a wilful slurring over of others, out of any complex question or body of facts, it can re-model the whole in satisfactory unison with its most corrupt inclinations. Now Scripture is both a moral (taking the word in its widest sense) and historical book, and the facilities of perversion are very much increased, by the very circumstance which we have seen to be favourable to ingenuous minds, namely, its arrangement. This is not that regular and closely woven chain which binds the reader to follow every step, examine every point, resisting by its systematic connection every attempt to omit or displace any link. But, in addition, the corrupt bosom is sure to carry into the perusal the most hearty good will to pervert. For the real views which the book exhibits are so humbling to human pride, so full of menace and stern rebuke, to the darling propensities of fallen man, and unfold such awful views of present responsibility and future judgment, that our corrupt nature gladly lays hold of any means of turning aside from so uninviting a contemplation. In deducing, therefore, its doctrines, such a bosom will select or omit such quantity and quality of detail as best suits its own previous views. Is not the history of the Church of Christ full of examples of this abuse of Scripture, and see we not the most determined self-accommodation in those who, in our days, denying our Lord's atonement, conduct their controversy with a perversion and disingenuousness incredible to those who have not witnessed it? But, perhaps, on a strict self-examination, we may find something of this in our own selves; and our own consciousness, combining with the memory of past experience, will suggest but too many of those shades of corrupt feeling which intervene between the first timid flutter of stricken conscience or wounded vanity, which would fain, but dares not, turn aside from some mortifying conclusion; and the proud defiance which shuts the volume at once, as speaking the language of a reproachful enemy.

A frank and ingenuous mind alone would profit of old from the preaching of our Saviour and his apostles; and the same is equally required for the profitable perusal of what they have left in writing. We must approach this volume, as we would the ark of God, with a profound reverence, with a wholesome fear of violating its purity, and with an offering of our whole heart, laying it open before him to his searching light in all its deepest recesses, without the reserve of a single nook, or the subterfuge of a single turning. Thus seeking in all humility the knowledge of his will, and not the confirmation of our own, we shall obtain the blessed guidance of the Holy Spirit, who will at once purify our bosom, and enlighten our understanding.

The very nature of this book, we have seen, forbids any correct information to be derived from such a perusal as is given to other books; a slight reading will neither dissipate previously entertained errors, nor attain to any sound doctrine, but, on the contrary, is likely to add but error to error. We are sufficiently fortunate in such a case, if we are supplied with a bare historical belief of the facts of Scripture. But never can we arrive at the deep and lively impressions of the heart, the holy temperament of the feelings, the linking of the thoughts in one bond, the direction of them to one object, the steadiness of view which can behold the light without a mote in the eye, or a cloud in the air,—in a word, a firmly rooted faith. This is the reward of far superior exertions, the effect of an union of heart and understanding in the same cause, which can be attained by unwearied diligence only, exerted in putting together again and again, and weighing in all its bearings the detail of Holy Writ.

But it must be pursued also with more than common perseverance. In the perusal of other books we may often arrive at their conclusion with our reasoning advanced, and imagination excited beyond the point at which the author has paused. And in every case, so circumscribed is the mind of man, a definite number of perusals is sufficient to give us full possession of all which the author himself really understood. But Scripture presents us with a portion of the mind of God, and who hath ever known that, or been his counsellor? Or who shall set limits to it, and think that it shall be comprehended in the limited mind of man? The least particle of revelation from God, in intimate connexion as it is with all above and below, past and future, is sufficient for ever to task the human faculties. Were, therefore, life protracted to a period ever so long, the more he studied, the more also would the student find to demand his study still. The heart needs a continual renewal of healthy affections, by feeding upon the sense of God's will; the understanding to be brought, from continual deviation, into adjustment with the standard of divine truth; and as page is turned over day after day, fresh passages are starting into importance, while others, which appeared detached, are forming clusters in his mind; and in every direction views are expanding, difficulties clearing up, deeper and more lasting impressions are forming. Who, for instance, will say that his understanding ever arrived at an unbroken view, even within its reasonable limits, in the Epistle to the Romans? Who, that his heart ever satisfied itself with reaching the depth of feeling expressed in St. Paul's farewell address to the Church of Ephesus,—how much less in those passages in which he accompanies the Saviour of the world to the cross? Who, that he ever satisfied either heart or understanding, in the crowded magnificence and awakening conclusions of the Epistle to the Hebrews? The book which tells of the future life, may indeed well demand for its comprehension all the employment of this, and the word of God for ever invite the highest exertion of the faculties of man.

With these qualifications then of more than common sincerity, attention, and perseverance, the student must approach the holy volume. The grand requisite implied in them all is an habitual and patient examination of detail, an habitual and careful study of facts, which must be the more numerous and the more established, in proportion to the extent and weight of the superstructure.

Unfortunately this requisite is less common than it was. It is the fault of our stage of society. Our predecessors have left us so many aids in every department of knowledge, so furnished us every where with ready-made collections of facts, with ready-drawn outlines and systems, that he must have a mind far more independent and original than his fellows, who will forego all these advantages, and seek for himself; who will despise the vanity and low ambition which can make an ostentatious display of knowledge acquired at second hand, and can exult in the borrowed plumage of far nobler minds; who will enter with the undaunted spirit of the champion into all the dust and tumult of the arena, and grapple hand to hand with detail; who, amid a multitude of facts, will form his own combinations, create his own shapes, cut out through the perplexing wilderness his own views, and disdain to rest content with what are termed general views,—those ordinary tracks through the field of knowledge, which have been trodden bare by twice ten thousand minds before.

To the formation of a character so requisite, there are many obstacles opposed, and by far the most serious, we see, are those which spring up in the very field of knowledge itself. The deceitfulness of the ground, indeed, is proverbial, and the more we become acquainted with it, the more we perceive the necessity of keeping a guard upon every step. Yet it is daily entered without the least foresight or precaution, as if there were a single spot in the regions of body or mind which the great adversary had not beset with his stumbling-blocks.

One character ill-suited for this study, is he who has been allured to the wide field of general knowledge, which is spread before him in such imposing extent and pleasing variety. The allurement having been his own gratification, whether of indolent amusement or of selfish vanity, he enters it under a baneful influence; for in every pursuit it is the object which gives it its character, and rewards it with a blessing or a curse. Such a person, therefore, flies from pursuit to pursuit, as the drone from flower to flower, without gathering honey. In course of time, his mind, habituated every where, from want of leisurely investigation, to gratuitous assumption, grows insensible to the force of proof: by neglecting the proper means of forming its own views, and passively borrowing those of others, its independence is broken, its stability destroyed, its native vigour and straight forward ingenuity is lost. Loose and desultory habits come in the place of single-minded, persevering industry; judgment is perverted, perception confused, memory ill-arranged and treacherous; and an overweening vanity which mistakes for talent its slavish docility, which decries as the food of plodding dulness, that detail which itself has neither sincerity to appreciate, nor powers of attention to master, nor vigour of faculties to digest,—this fills up the measure of the curse of barrenness, with which God ever visits the abuse of his gifts. What then has such a person to do with a book demanding such large endowments of qualities which he possesses not, and the spirit of which, above all, recoils from the unholy apprehension of falsehood and vanity; breathing, as it does, meekness and lowliness, gentleness and unwearied patience, from every page?

Ill-suited, likewise, is another character, in many respects opposed to the last. He who has hung over the treasures of ancient literature with that exclusive attention, that he has imbibed its proud and intolerant spirit, so that every other literature appears rude and barbarous, and, above all, that book whose spirit throughout is opposed both to the style of his favourite poets, the maxims of his favourite philosophers, the characters of his favourite worthies. Hence is that book but too frequently overlooked by men who have devoted their time and talents to this department of learning. And even when it is taken up, the profit is often far less to such persons than to other men. From having contracted their field of view, and neglected the healthy supplies to the mind from the world without, and also from the license of conjecture indulged in such a study, these men are apt to carry to the Holy Volume a spirit little agreeable to it. They have not sufficient reverence for its authority; they are arbitrary both in the reception of the text, and in their interpretation of it; and are, above all men, liable to the disease of an irregulated imagination. Nothing, indeed, can be more arbitrary in its choice than this, and nothing more exclusive when it has chosen. If it will fix upon the brilliant and vast for the room which it gives to its extravagance, it will also choose the trifling for the indulgence of the pride of creation; for there it experiences the consciousness of its own powers displayed in the magnitude to which, by the gorgeous dress laid on, it has swollen an object so insignificant. All between, which includes the golden mean of calm and sober dignity, is overlooked and despised. It comes, therefore, but ill prepared to the simple language, the sober dignity, and unaffected good sense of the Holy Text. By capriciously laying undue stress on particular points of the detail, and not giving every part its due weight, so that all shall be in harmonious equipoise, it forms a tottering edifice of belief, of discordant parts and proportions, and distorted in a multitude of ways from the features of stable grandeur, exhibited by the glorious original, the spiritual Temple of God.

A third character also ill-qualified to approach the Holy Volume, with the due correctness and proper information, is he who has never extended his serious pursuit of knowledge beyond the boundaries of the exact sciences. He is too apt to confound the nature of moral and abstract truth, which in this instance are particularly opposed; in the latter case a general truth having been discovered, all the detail included under it is also in our power whenever we choose to apply it; the proposition, retained in memory, involves all that it did when first discerned; it loses nothing of force, and lies ever ready for immediate application in all its original extent. In the former case all this is reversed: in order to obtain the general truth, we must have mastered the detail of which it is the result, and so far from the recollection of the general truth giving us the means of working out at any time the detail, its impression on the mind will be correct only in proportion to the quantity of detail retained with it, and to the freshness with which each particular is remembered. Hence, to keep up this general proposition in the memory, we must be continually repairing the loss of detail which the infirmity of our memory is continually letting drop; and this detail is acquired and maintained also not only by the powers of the head, but also by the feelings of the heart, the former of which were alone consulted in the preceding case, but the latter are principal here. Hence also, this detail is slow of acquirement, for while the understanding is to the mind as the sight to the body, informing it at a single glance; the heart is as the touch, informing it by the slow and successive application of parts, and its lesson comes upon it by the gradual process of page on page, letter on letter, line on line. In Scripture this is most especially the case, since there the doctrine is mixed with a body of facts upon which it is dependant; and each fact, on every fresh application to it, will not only revive former feelings, but also occasion new, so that we cannot pronounce at any moment, without the most gross self-delusion, that we are masters of Scriptural detail. Our whole life can but accumulate it, never complete its store.

From his confounding then these two species of truth, such a character is too much inclined to undervalue the difficulties attending the reception of religious truth, and also to be blind to the necessity of a constant recurrence to the written word of God. He is too apt to be satisfied with the general notions which he has of its doctrine, and which he has derived through an imperfect channel, considering them to give him possession of the results of the detail of the Holy

Volume, into which, as into a set of subordinate truths, they are resolvable at pleasure. He forgets the principal and peculiar province of the heart, or recoils from its tardy mode of acquirement; thus not only have his habits of thinking disinclined him from the proper and minute study of Scripture, but he is not so much as aware of its supreme necessity.

These cases, to which more might have been added, have been stated as briefly and generally as possible; and, as all general cases must be, pushed to their extremes. It is not necessary to qualify them here, or give them more practical substance. They form three great classes, to which, either single or combined, we may refer all imperfect believers; and certainly few, if any, of those who have tasted the enjoyment of a liberal education, and paid proper attention to the internal operations of their own minds, can fail to have detected in his own bosom, at some period or other, the elements of each. They must have experienced the strong temptation of a wide field of knowledge; they must have indulged, like the child who presses his closed eyes, in the brilliant and gorgeous hues of the imagination; they must have felt the power of philosophical generalization. Happy they! if they shall have been enabled to keep down each element in due and healthful subordination.

These cases are sufficient for the point in hand, which was to show the more prominent obstacles which the pursuit itself of knowledge throws in the way of the study of Scripture, rendering more rare than perhaps is generally thought, and certainly than could be desired, the character which was laid down for its earnest and improving student.

But it would be strange indeed if the cultivated mind were not exposed to increased difficulties and obnoxious to greater perils; the extension of any sphere of good is (alas! for our corrupt nature) necessarily that also of the evil with which it is so intimately mixed up; and the Giver of all good things, as he bestows not his gifts in vain, would depart from his established economy of the world, if he did not accompany them with corresponding trials to call forth and perfect their due exercise; therefore the cultivated mind dwells in the midst of perils, and, like the intruder into power, cannot remain with impunity where it is. It must neither tarry nor sleep: conspiracies of the powers of darkness are around it, which, as they grow more threatening, it must surmount by going on to greater and still greater power, until it attain that sovereign unassailable power which is conferred by the knowledge of the word of God. There alone is its resting-place, there alone its throne, whence it can behold its enemies in subjection beneath its footstool.

A sovereign power, indeed, is that knowledge to which all other knowledge must administer but as a loyal subject; for all other, however brilliant in appearance, however vast in extent, however useful in means, yet, if it be independent of this, terminates but in the mortal body. This is the fountain of honour to them all; yet (such is the perversity of human nature) as God is forgotten for his angels and saints by the weak and superstitious, so is this forgotten for its servants by the wise of this world.

Great, overpoweringly great, is the responsibility of those to whom God hath assigned the blessed gifts of talents to learn, and of leisure and opportunity of learning. The aid which they can bring to the cause of religious truth is manifest, but the harm which their apathy (to say nothing of their opposition) can effect is too little considered; here, indeed, our Lord may more especially exclaim, "Who is not with me is against me." On the unthinking, and on such as are guided by the examples around them, (and how large a portion of society is this,) is it necessary to state the effect of indifference to God's word, shown by men looked up to for power of talent and extent of information? When they see that all the treasures of knowledge have been ransacked but this, see all subjects eagerly discussed but this, find all books painfully marked and noted but this; can they do otherwise than learn to treat this volume with disrespect,—to reckon it dull and uninviting, mean and homely, a book for the vulgar? But even such treatment is less injurious, such silence less pernicious, than the levity of discussion with which it is sometimes entertained by persons of reputation for human wisdom. Unwilling, in their ostentatious display, and pretension to all knowledge, to appear quite ignorant of this, they will subject it to the same superficial means of acquirement, and with the same careless levity, as they treat the ephemeral productions of the day, which serve for subjects of conversation. Hence its awful truths are discussed with a licentious laxity of opinion, the debaters seeking effect, and not conviction, and putting together in wrong, if not paradoxical and fantastic combinations, such detached passages as happen, amid their careless hearing or reading of the word, to have solicited and retained upon their memory. The opinions of such men on religion, worthless (to say the least) as they are, unfortunately exercise much influence on that large class which look up to men of literary character as to infallible guides in every department. It were better for such to hold their tongue for ever upon this awful subject, than to rush into it without a knowledge conscientiously sought, and therefore correctly attained.

Some scholars, some men of character for all the attainments of human knowledge, embraced the faith of Jesus even in the earlier days of the gospel. Such was probably Dionysius the Areopagite, and such certainly was Justin Martyr. Let us, who have revelled, as they also had done, on the feast of literature, consider the frame of mind which led them in the end to make the inestimable preference of the word of God. Their faculties had not been abused and dissipated by frivolous and heartless pursuit of superficial knowledge; they had not been dulled by indolence of light reading, nor perverted by vanity, but had been maintained in all liveliness of health and vigour, so that the mind, having its natural sway, should pursue its legitimate objects. It must have had quick all its native curiosity, all its candour, its love of truth, all its energy of pursuit, all its singleness of view. Such qualities (and let us ever bear this in mind) it must have brought to that investigation, which God has ordained to be its noblest exercise, the investigation of his attributes; and to this end also it must have habitually practised temperance, to keep itself in vigour; prudence, to direct its exertions by the shortest and surest way; fortitude, to keep its own unswerving course, undiverted by the authority of names; adding to them all, patience to endure, perseverance to pursue, hope to attain. To such a mind spoke St. Paul at Athens, and beyond all our powers of conception must have been the effect. Let us imagine a treasure long sought, under a hope, indeed, but not assurance, of its existence, to be at last found; a grief long suffered to be turned into joy; darkness long and thick to be suddenly changed into uninterrupted light; life to be given for death. So came upon these primitive scholars the tidings of salvation in Christ Jesus. And shall not we, their successors in both fields of knowledge; we, in whom the order has been reversed, who knew the sound of the word of God long before the dictates of the philosopher, or the tale of the poet; who never knew what real darkness was, any more than he who at will retires for a short time into a cavern from the rays of the sun, in order to enjoy them again in greater effect of warmth and brilliancy,—shall not we maintain with equal sense of its value, with equal joy and satisfaction, the inestimable gift? Shall not we, who all our life long, both in ourselves and in others, have been experiencing its blessed effects, maintain our profession as zealously as they chose it? O what a state of condemnation would ours be, if, in contrast to those learned men of old, who changed the philosopher for the Christian, we should exchange the Christian for the philosopher. God forbid such a termination. Let us diligently provide against the slightest probability of it.

A tendency to this result belongs to mature age. But there are many here present who have still the great part of their course before them. They are at that period of life, when it is enjoyed to all its measure of fulness; when the experience is common of those blissful moments, in which, from health of body and lightness of heart, the bare animal existence is felt as an inestimable blessing. What feelings then, let me ask of them, can they conceive as attending the consciousness of existence of a mind fresh in spiritual health, and full of the glad assurance of immortality? How joyous, how divine! Such a sense is conferred by the word of God: thus its knowledge bestows the blissful feelings of eternal youth upon the mind. Let the recurrence and the remembrance of such moments serve to bring the analogy to view, and accustom them to appreciate the exceeding value of this heavenly gift. This (let them bear ever in mind) is the one thing, without which all knowledge at the best is useless, and may be most pernicious. For knowledge, though indeed a glorious, a powerful instrument, yet like all mere human acquisitions, is in itself but a brute weapon, depending, for its effect of good or evil, upon the mind of the employer, and may be used in felling God's cedars on Libanus, when it should be hewing down the groves of Baal.

Let them, then, remembering their Creator in the days of their youth, dedicate to the study of his life-giving word the freshness of the morning of their days: even now, in this their day, while the heart is yet plastic and unperverted, still in healthy communion with the head; while the mental vision is yet clear; while the power of observation is yet fresh and keen of edge,—of attention yet undistracted, of memory yet retentive. On the suitable employment of these mental gifts, depends not only their native health and masculine vigour of mind, but the power of appreciating divine truth is concerned, the welfare of their immortal souls is at stake. Let them, therefore, together with the blessing, consider the responsibility also of the gift which God has conferred upon them in a liberal education; and as they gaze upon the wide and spirit-stirring prospect which he has thus unveiled to them, and feel the firmness of grasp, and the extent of power, with which he has thus endowed their understanding, let them resolve to render unto him who gave, the first fruits of their harvest. With the Word of God let them begin, and with the full blessing of the Word of God they shall end. The right understanding, the unreserved acceptance of this, let them ever keep in view; and, looking steadfastly to the end, cheerfully enter upon the labour of detail, accustoming their minds, in all conscientiousness, to that patience which alone can produce a perfect work, or attain a precious object. For without the substantial support of a full body of well-canvassed facts, reason will decline into barren speculation, imagination will degenerate into idle dreaming. Let theirs be the patience of that wise king of yore, who built the temple of the living God; and, laying fact upon fact, as it were stone upon stone, let them, like good spiritual masons, gradually raise and combine their views, until all shall grow in harmonious proportions of strength and beauty into a goodly temple, aptly fitted together. In such a temple only of the mind will scriptural truth deign to dwell; and it will dwell, and fill the whole house with the glory of the Lord.

DISSERTATION VI.

ON SACRIFICE.

The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world.—John i. 29.

It is difficult to conceive how any one, who believes in the atonement of our blessed Saviour, can consider sacrifice to be of any other than divine institution: the Jewish sacrifices, and more especially that of the Lamb, are continually appealed to in the New Testament as foreshadowing the offering of his body upon the cross. But these are but the continuation, under certain qualifications, of a rite which can be traced up to the immediate sons of Adam. Now had it been the invention of Adam, or of these his sons, and had so spread through all their descendants, as to become an universal means of worshipping God,—which last we know to have been the fact,—would God, when he took so much pains to separate the children of Israel from the rest of the world, and keep them far away from the abominations of the Heathen, have maintained among them a rite which, beyond every other, was universally held with the grossest notions, and practised with the vilest abominations? Would he, had it contained nothing more than what the carnal mind of man could impart to it, have suffered among his chosen people this stepping-stone to the horrible depravities and uncleanness of the sacrificers to Moloch, and to Baal? Would he have taken out of the hands of man a rite which his creature had invented under gross conceptions, (for blood-shedding, as conceived by himself, could not be otherwise,) and abused to his deepest moral degradation;—would he have adopted this as the vehicle and type of the greatest and purest of moral blessings, even of the atonement of his only begotten son?—or viewing it even in the highest light which it will thus bear, namely, as an act of will-worship of the first man, conceived in his purest thoughts; is it consonant with due notions of the Almighty to suppose that God, by a second thought as it were, imparted to this act a meaning which he himself had previously revealed, but without making any provision for thus embodying and continuing it? It must be some strong prejudice indeed which should make us espouse a supposition clogged with such difficulties, and reject one which immediately brings all into harmony. But if we proceed in our examination, we shall see that such a means of worshipping God never could of itself have entered into the minds of the persons who are represented as having first employed it.

The occasions on which man approaches God, may be reduced to two:—he comes before him with his offering, either to thank him for past mercies, and to implore their continuance, or to ask pardon for past offences, and deprecate punishment. But however we may in thought separate these occasions, yet, in the worship of a fallen creature like man, they must ever be combined; the offering, therefore, which he brings must be considered in the twofold light of a gift, and a ransom: of a gift, as the natural expression of thanksgiving and homage to him who gave, and can give more, who is the ruler and maker of all things: of a ransom, to him to whom his life hath been forfeited by transgression, to him whose holy nature cannot endure the least unholiness, and who can take away no less than give. Considering it then as a gift, we find it hard to reconcile this meaning with the very inadequate notions which the first sacrificer (who could not be later than Cain or Abel) must necessarily have had, both with regard to its nature and efficacy; such a meaning surely supposes a stage of society much advanced beyond his. Let this point, however, be granted; we have next to ask how he could conceive a slaughtered beast to be a gift?—to us, habituated to animal food, the idea is not so incongruous. But how could men not allowed the use of such food, thus conceive of it? How could Noah, (to come lower down still,) who offered his sacrifice upon his deliverance, imagine that he was thus presenting a gift? How, when death was an idea so exceedingly abhorrent to the mind of the first sacrificer, could he dare in the very first instance to put an animal to death; much more to present it as an acceptable gift to a being of those attributes which his yet unadulterated creed acknowledged? The same objections are fatal to its being considered as a ransom; and to these we may add the impossibility of supposing that a man's reason could induce him to conceive that the life of another could be any substitute for his own, except by express compact between the parties offending and offended; still less could it go a step farther, and make the life of an irrational animal that substitute.

But if we suppose him to have sacrificed on the express injunction of God, every thing is clear. Humbly acknowledging that he had forfeited life and light by his transgression, deeply thankful for God's merciful pardon, he would joyfully accept (although he could not of himself have devised) this lively mode of expressing both his confession and thanksgiving—the more lively from its repugnance to law and feeling; and when once revealed, sacrifice so adapts itself to every turn of man's feelings towards a superior being, that it would survive the wreck of every other portion of God's church. For since the notions formed of God by impure and gross minds, are also gross and impure, the offering of blood and of meats would be a suitable expression of their homage or deprecation to the lustful, capricious, and cruel beings, whom their corrupt imaginations had set upon the throne of heaven. Thus it would be maintained (though under a very different view) no less by the apostate than by the believer, by the Heathen than by the Jew. And its universal prevalence proves no more, than that it is one of those instances where man can turn to the account of his own corrupt passions the will of God, as declared by his revealed word, no less than as expressed by the voice of nature.

We conclude, therefore, that this prominent feature in God's Church, was expressly ordained by him, who designed from the first to sum up all in Christ (Ephes. i. 10,) both in heaven and in earth, and that any other account of its origin is equally inconsistent with the original notions of man, and with the harmony of divine revelation.

Hence, sacrifice embodied to man the circumstances of God's first intervention with him after he had sinned; it was both a history and a prophecy; it carried him back to a lively view of his fall and condemnation to death; it carried him forward to a bright prospect of his redemption, both being figured to him by the death of the beast, which was slaughtered before his eyes and was accepted by God as an offering; and thus all its applications to outward circumstances, throughout all ages of the church, are referable to two heads. It is on the part of man, the offerer, either a confession of sin, or an oblation of thanksgiving: it is on the part of God, the acceptor, a correspondent remission of the sin, or an acceptance of the offering, implying a continuance or furtherance of blessings. And as prophecy, in reaching to its grand and final object, becomes applicable upon its way to many subordinate objects, so sacrifice (which is indeed a species of prophecy) is applicable to all circumstances which are subordinate to, and contained in, the one great deliverance from everlasting perdition. Accordingly we find, both in the Patriarchal and Jewish Church, sacrifices of propitiation both for moral and bodily impurities, and sacrifices of thanksgiving for any great success or signal deliverance; so Job sacrificed for his sons lest they should have thought evil in their hearts; so Noah sacrificed on his deliverance from the flood. To a mind, steadfast in holy hope, every chance and change of life will serve to bring the great end in view; and sacrifice, therefore, will convey the expression of its feelings, be they of abasement or exultation, whether it acknowledge its worthiness of condemnation, or its unworthiness of redemption.

The occasional sacrifices mentioned in the Old Testament, mostly concern, as would be likely from the recorded events which called them forth, the whole Church of God. Such is the sacrifice of Abel, who, although dead, yet speaketh: such is that of Noah, when he re-built the Church of God after the flood: such is that of Solomon, when he dedicated the Temple of God. And since sacrifice was also the covenanted channel of communication between God and man, we find that some particular sacrifice forms the link between the successive stages of the church. The offering of Isaac, upon which God promised Abraham a posterity numerous as the stars in heaven or sand on the sea shore, and that in his seed all nations of the earth should be blessed, connects immediately the Patriarchal with the Jewish Church, and draws cords of relation to the Christian. A particular celebration of the Jewish Passover, connects the Jewish with the Christian: for at this our Lord not only instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, which should supersede that Jewish rite, but also, yielding up his breath at the very hour of evening sacrifice, combined the type and the reality, the shadow and the substance, the former and the latter days.

We have said that sacrifice was prophecy in a bodily shape: it follows also the same law of expanding clearness of meaning, by means of narrowing limitation of application, which we saw was observed by the other, in passing through the Jewish dispensation. As a national offering, it was limited to a number of particular cases, each sending forth from many mouths a loud prophetic voice, as the stated daily sacrifice, the Feast of the Passover, the day of atonement. As a private offering it met a number of stated cases of impurity, which, going to the very bodily condition of the person, even to the meats which he ate, reminded the Jew of his natural unholiness, his conventional holiness. Thus restored to purity, he typified bodily the spirit elect of God, of whom his Son should in the latter days compose his church, having made them clean by the sacrifice of his own body; and assuredly this solemn and striking rite, being thrust upon his continual attention, must have prepared the serious thinker to look beyond the letter, and seek for the spirit. It became also still more pointed to its object, by being confined to the tabernacle, and by the varying place of that tabernacle being at last fixed at Jerusalem, after the temple had been built. And just as the promise of the Redeemer was generally narrowed from the whole family of mankind, from the seed of Abraham, from that of Isaac, from that of Jacob, from the tribe of Judah down to the house of David; so, in this analogous rite, his representative, the High Priest, was gradually taken from a narrower range,—from the first born of mankind, from the nation of the Jews, from the tribe of Levi, from the family of Aaron. Thus significantly converging through successive stages from many quarters to one end, sacrifice, receiving its substance in the death of our Redeemer, closed for ever its shadowy representations.

But as prophecy, though it received its grand fulfilment as far as man looked for, in the coming of the Saviour, Jesus Christ, and had become history, yet took up a new strain at this point, and turned all eyes towards his second coming in glory to judge both the quick and the dead, as the end of all things: so sacrifice, although it received its full accomplishment in the death of our Redeemer, by whom it was once offered for the sins of the whole world, past, present, and to come, and therefore, as a rite, is virtually extinct; yet has had its place supplied in God's church by an ordinance, which is both historically commemorative, and at the same time prophetically assuring. This is the sacrament of the Lord's supper, in which we not only commemorate his death and passion, but also look forward to his coming again. And although it be, as we have said, no real sacrifice, yet, inasmuch as it is commemorative, and therefore symbolical, of the great sacrifice, inasmuch as the sign is often called by the name of the thing signified, inasmuch as its included offerings of prayer, of repentance, of thanksgiving, of charity, are each of them figuratively designated by this title in Scripture, we may in common language (which is never peculiarly strict) join with the ancient church in calling it by a term, which brings at once so many of its relations to view. On this principle we will now proceed to consider it, ever keeping a watchful eye upon its predecessor.

First of all, the hideous and appalling representation of death, exhibited to our predecessors in the bleeding, groaning, and struggling victim, has been removed from our eyes. Several reasons concur for this, all arising out of the fulfilment of the type. For instance;—the Patriarch and the Jew looked forward to an obscure future; the prospect of their deliverance was dim and distant. They required, therefore, a lively representation to bring it near to their minds; and as the ceremony was prophetic, it was necessary that it should, at the moment of fulfilment, confirm the truth, by the most startling coincidence of the figure with the reality. But to us, living after the fulfilment, and therefore looking back to one of the clearest and most carefully detailed facts of history, a resemblance so close were unnecessary. It would indeed be more than unnecessary; it would be inexpedient. For the ceremony, by going so far into reality as actual death, would be too strong an expression of a fact, of which we can form a very lively conception already, and a far more accurate, also, than any which could be suggested by any sensible object. Hence we could not but be struck by some disagreement between the sign and thing signified. At the same time, by going no further than death, it were mutilated and incomplete: it would tell us but half the truth, showing, indeed, the death for our sins, but not the resurrection for our justification. For us, therefore, it is not only sufficient, but even expedient, that the signs employed in our commemorative rite should be as slight as the mind's ordinary powers can allow, and more especially when these signs have been instituted by the great Offerer himself; since the very circumstance of institution necessarily fixes our attention upon the event commemorated; therefore the mere pouring out of wine and breaking of bread, coupled with his charge to continue this commemoration until his coming again, are sufficient to lead our minds to the crucifixion of his body, the shedding of his blood, and his second coming in glory to judge both the quick and the dead. But the most important reason of all is the nature of the gospel of Christ. It is the proclamation of pardon to all mankind,—it is the declaration of the perfect love of God,—it is the certification of his wrath appeased, and of his justice satisfied; it is the announcement of the victory over death, and of the life everlasting. Aptly, therefore, in this rite, has the harsh threat and open rebuke of death (which daily humbled the Patriarch and the Jew), been removed from the eyes of the celebrator. For a frightful scene of gasps, and groans, and bubbling blood, has been substituted a picture of overpowering love—a representation of the last supper of our Lord; meat and drink, emblems of life and joy, are set before us, and both signify and convey to us the nourishment of everlasting life, which we have in his body and blood: meat and drink, not supplied from slaughtered fellow-creatures, but being the untortured products of the earth. Thus the very nature of the elements which show our Lord's death, conveys the assurance of the abolition of death to ourselves.

Secondly: We saw that sacrifice carried the mind of the offerer both backward and forward: backward, by the death of the victim, to the sentence of death at the fall; forward, by God's acceptance of this substitute, to his restoration. Alas! through what a long and dreary interval did his eye move to reach this last bright object! How weary and sickened did his heart arrive at this resting-place! and, after all, how faint was that brightness, how unstable that resting-place, compared with ours. Our rite, too, is both retrospective and prospective. But what is our retrospect? not our fall, but our redemption. And what is our prospect? not our redemption, but our exaltation to life and light everlasting, at the second coming of our great God and Saviour. We begin with historical certainty of fact, where he ended in prophetic hope: we end with the complete and glorious reversal of the condition of misery and degradation, with which he began. Thus we have a bright and burning light at each extreme of view, and all between is full of joy, and peace, and comfort. "Oh Lord, our Governor! how excellent is thy name in all the world," exclaimed David, on considering the glory of the heavens: what words would he have found had he been admitted to this our spectacle, and gazed on the spiritual firmament which is expanded before our eyes!

Thirdly: On the same principle with sacrifice, this rite will be an especial vehicle of confession and of thanksgiving, on the occasion of the various incidents of life. These, be they to our pleasure or our pain, to our encouragement or chastisement, it is our duty to point to the great end of our being, to turn to the account of the life to come. If we suffer, let us take care so to suffer as fellow-sufferers of Christ; if we be in joy, let us be mindful so to rejoice, as joint-heirs with him in bliss. In either case, this rite, setting forth our Lord's death and passion, and also assuring us of his glorious coming again, will be in exact accord with our hearts, will give them proper vent and due expression, and with its refreshing benefits supply grace for grace; therefore, in all the grand interventions of life, hither let us resort,—here let us seek the Lord, and we shall find him. As surely as he performed his promise of meeting his disciples in Galilee, after his resurrection from death, so surely will he meet us here, and give the blessings of his spiritual presence. If God of old chose the hour of sacrifice of bulls and rams, in which to reveal himself, and made gracious promises to Abraham and Zachariah, will he leave this ordinance fruitless, in which we spiritually partake of the sacrifice of the body and blood of his only begotten Son? Therefore, let him who hath fallen into sickness or trouble, hither repair, to make confession of his sins, and acknowledge God's justice. He will not have come in vain; he shall have mercy for justice. Let him who hath risen from pain or sorrow, here confess himself less than the least of God's mercies, yield his entire thanks; neither shall he have come in vain: his hope and his joy shall be chastened into that hope and joy which can never fail. Let those who have lately joined their cares, their joys, their fortunes, their affections, here make their solemn homage and profession, as heads of a new household in the Church of God; neither shall they have come in vain: God will give them grace to rear children of grace, and they shall be succeeded by heirs of promise.

Fourthly: Like sacrifice, and, indeed, every other ordinance of worship, this rite will be one of stated times and seasons. Now, if we be bound to repair to it whenever we can, under whatever circumstances of life, since all (we have seen) are peculiarly met with some appropriate blessing, how can we willingly absent ourselves on fixed occasions? Is it more difficult to prepare a due oblation of our hearts, because we have time at our command? Are we less peculiarly circumstanced for the reception of blessings in this sacrament, because we have leisure to review beforehand our whole condition, and thus to find out its chief bearing? Does the general benefit of anticipation meet here with its single exception? are we less prepared when in the enjoyment of health of body and mind, and with days, and even weeks, before us, than when surprised by sickness and dismay, and obliged desperately to snatch at opportunity, ere it be too late? "Three times a year shall thy males appear before me," said the Lord God to the Jews, in giving his ordinances of stern command from the blazing mount; and, dispersed as they were, they gathered before him from every quarter of the earth. "Do this in remembrance of me," said our Divine Master to his church, in delivering his last charge of love at his last meal. What then? Are we less bounden than the Jew? need we pay less attention because our summons has come more in the form of a request than of a command: because our love is appealed to, and not our fear; because we are invited as men, and not compelled as children? True it is that the request of man may be neglected, because it commonly implies the want of means of enforcing his will. But the request of God, is an expression of love, and not of weakness. It is a commandment, and the most fearful to the disobedient of all commandments; for it appeals not to our carnal man, not to our slavish fear, of pains and penalties: but it is addressed to our spiritual man, to our love and eagerness of obedience, the fruits of that love. If therefore we hear not, where is our spiritual man? and then, indeed, where, alas! are we?

This last analogy with sacrifice has now brought me to the practical consideration of this sacrament of God's church; with this I will proceed.

Very different indeed from the prevailing notions of the present day, were those which were entertained on this point by the earlier Christians. Let us for a moment suppose one of these hearers of the hearers of our Lord, or even of the hearers of the sixth or eighth succession from them, to arise and take his stand in a church of these times and of this land. Let us endeavour to conceive his feelings on seeing (as we repeatedly see) a whole congregation turn their backs upon the table of the Lord, and thus voluntarily put themselves into a situation, which with him was one of incapacity or degradation, reserved for children, for the unbaptized, for the lapsed, for the possessed: on hearing the solitary minister of that table call, with the voice of one crying in the wilderness, lost upon stocks and stones: would he deign to acknowledge for a portion of Christ's church, that crowd which he saw hurrying through the door, as if escaping from an unwelcome invitation? would he condescend to term that a flock of Christ, which he saw refusing the food provided for them by their shepherd? He would indignantly deny all fellowship with them in Christ; he would assert that they had neither part nor portion with him,—that the memory of his mercies was unpleasing to them,—that they recked not of his body and his blood,—and careless of how he had come, were careless also of how he would come. Were we to ask him, in what company then would he place them, he would unhesitatingly answer, in the company of Peter, who denied his master; in the company of Judas, who quitted that very table to betray him. To any attempt at palliation, he would indignantly demand if we held that to forget God is not to have cast him out of mind,—to neglect his injunctions is not to rebel against him,—not to thank him for his blessings is not to slight them,—not to be with him is not to be against him,—not to gather is not to scatter? However reproachful this language may appear, no one, who is acquainted with the sentiments of the earlier ages, will assert that it is stronger than such as would rise to the lips, if not pass them, of such a spectator. Custom has reconciled us to the sight, and so it will to that of the most hideous deformities; they are not the less really hideous notwithstanding.

After this none will surely find fault with the plain uncompromising language of our church, which so earnestly enjoins her members to repair to the celebration of this rite, and so solemnly warns them when they are come. She uses the language of Scripture, and such language will equally condemn us in carelessly approaching God with private prayer. There, however, neither she nor any other human agent can interfere. There we must be left to our own comfortable self-delusion, and no words from without can interrupt the pleasing dream that we are really praying, when we are neither penitent, nor thankful, nor obedient. But here, in a public ceremony, where her voice must needs be heard, she exhorts and she deprecates in the most earnest terms, and honestly opens the truth, however unpalatable. She is the most anxious and affectionate of mothers. Let us not then complain of her public severity, but rather embrace it as an occasion of inquiring into our private laxity. Let us not, by wilfully mistaking her affectionate exhortation for stern denunciation, be of that company, which, when our Saviour spoke of the eating of his flesh, and drinking of his blood, cried out, "This is a hard saying: who can hear it?" and walked with him no more.

This rite, my brethren, is a spiritual sacrifice, in which we spiritually celebrate the great sacrifice of our Saviour, once offered upon the cross; and entering into his sufferings unto death, which are our redemption unto life, we offer up ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy and lively sacrifice unto God. But men cry out here that they are not in a fit state to make use of such strong expressions, they cannot pledge themselves so far, their intentions cannot rise to a mark so high. Let them now consider, to what does all this really amount? Even to this, that their profession of Christianity is but that of the lips, that they will not form a single steady and sincere resolution, and so give God a single pledge that they will ever confess it in their hearts. Have they ever reflected that there is such a thing as apostacy, and no less amid the seductions of quiet luxurious times, than amid the compulsion of troublous and necessitous? Can they imagine, that either in one case or the other they can hold fast the faith of Christ, when they have taken no pains to acquire either knowledge or resolution which shall support them in the day of trial? For a real strife after such knowledge and resolution would of necessity bring them to the table of the Lord. But be the world how it will, full of joy or of sorrow, of seduction or of intimidation, the life of the Christian is a scene of continual trial, a long-protracted agony of conflict. Sacrifices are there to be daily offered by him to his Saviour, of pleasure, of comfort, of riches, of power, of affection, of every thing which the world holds precious. And will a single such sacrifice ever be offered by him who will not so much as engage in the shadowy representation of the great sacrifice? Will he ever suffer for Christ's sake, who will no teven enter upon the bare commemoration of his sufferings? Will he ever take up, still more bear, the cross of Christ, who turns away from his table? Here, then, my brethren, is a most simple test, and at the same time most effectual. The time is indeed gone by, since this rite has been applied as a test of allegiance to an earthly sovereign. But it will ever remain a test of loyalty to our Heavenly Sovereign; and disaffection cannot but be most justly imputed to him who refuses to take it.

How blissfully, amid all the horrors of the wilderness, amid the conflict of surrounding enemies, could the eye and heart of the pious Israelite repose upon the cloudy pillar of glory, which rested upon the tabernacle. There was peace. there was security, which no power of this world could disturb. And although he knew that God was ever nigh unto all them that call upon him, and that no sensible representation could bring him nearer, yet this visible token of his presence, and sign of his covenant, could not but administer continual hope of comfort. And are we, amid the perplexing wilderness of life, amid the weary struggle with foes of body and soul, are we left destitute of similar comfort? Oh no! the same Lord of glory, who exhibited that symbol of his helping presence to the Israelite, hath ordained a resting-place for our spiritual eye. He hath established among us a visible sign, and given us in this rite a palpable assurance, that if we suffer, then we suffer with him who rose again, and ascended to prepare mansions of bliss for his faithful followers; for if he show us his death, he also foreshows to us his coming again, when all enemies, with their great leaders, sin and death, shall be put under his footstool, and he shall receive his own into everlasting glory.

Come, then, let us offer our sacrifice, and the greater our health and wealth, so much the more let us repair to its celebration: for we have both more to be thankful for, and all our affections and faculties are in their best vigour for God's service. Let us not wait for the desponding, the distracting, the misgiving hour of sickness; nor let the hour of death so surprise us, as but to leave time for our first and last celebration of the Lord's supper, as the only test which, after a life of so many opportunities, we can give of our profession. What were this but the delusion of him who deemed to save his soul by securing his dying limbs in the dress of a monk? Let us then come to our Lord's table, and bring with us to it a thankful acknowledgment of the high and blessed privileges of light under which we are invited to it. Consider a moment, my brethren, and look at the patriarch: see with what a vague undefined prospect of the mode of his redemptoin, he brings his offering to the altar. Look at the Jew: behold how, in despite of the light of his law playing around, of the blaze of prophecy streaming in advance, yet is in ignorance of the precise events by which his salvation shall be wrought, that he goes up to the altar. And now look at yourselves: with a clear knowledge of the manner of your redemption, of the character of your Redeemer, every object, every motion, every word in the rite before you, implying no obscure future, veiling no promised blessing, but referring you to past events distinctly and minutely made known to you, the blessed effects of which you are now experiencing in substance, not anticipating in hope; the whole scheme of man's restoration being drawn out and laid open before your eyes, your Saviour's express words inviting you; —thus, even thus do ye offer your reasonable, your bloodless sacrifice. Think of this, and compare your situation with that of the most enlightened and illustrious characters under the old covenants. Yea, compare it with that of Noah, when he built anew the church of God, on the renewal of the world after the flood: with that of Abraham offering up his son in a type of that which was to come: with that of David, when he brought up the ark of God into its resting place: with that of Solomon, when he made his royal and costly offerings on the dedication of God's temple: with that of Isaiah, when at sacrifice he beheld the glory of the Lord: with that of Zachariah, when the archangel Gabriel promised a Son, the forerunner of the Redeemer: with that of Simeon, when he offered the sacrifice of the blessed Mary, and held up in his arms the Saviour of the world. All these obtained not the promise, and the least of us in the kingdom of God is greater than them all. They had but the faint glimmer of the broad daylight amidst which we are living. Let us think of these things, and, endeavouring duly to estimate this our peculiar blessedness, thankfully dispose our hearts, so to eat of the bread and drink of the cup (which are the body and blood of our Saviour) upon earth, that we may indeed drink of the fruit of the spiritual vine, and eat of the spiritual bread of everlasting life, together with him, new, in the kingdom of God.

DISSERTATION VII.

ON THE PRIESTHOOD OF THE CHURCH OF GOD.

Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus.—Heb. iii. 1.

Christ, having been ordained for the salvation of mankind, and, in order to this end, having to reconcile by his mediation two separated parties, must have performed this office under a twofold character, by which he may present himself to either party on the part of the other,—to man on the part of God, to God on the part of man. In the first case, as sent from God, he would proclaim to man God's gracious intention, signify his gracious promise of pardon, and instruct him in the way of obtaining it. In the second case, he would appear before God with the means of satisfying his justice, and to present to him man's entire repentance, thanks, faith, homage, and submission. To the first of these his human nature was necessary; to the second his divine: the former is the duty of his apostolical character, the latter of his pontifical. Now, since the proper scenes on which these two appear are earth and heaven, he must previously to his advent have discharged the former by deputation: and since man requires a sign to assure him of the discharge of the latter, hence in this also, a representative on earth will be required. We have now to look out for these representatives in the Church of God.

Adam was evidently such a representative under both heads. As an offerer of sacrifice, he was the pontifical; as an inspired instructor of his children, he was the apostolical representative. And the same combination will continue throughout this stage; since the joint offering of a family cannot be so properly offered by any member as by the father, its natural head; and he is already invested by nature with the apostolical office. But in that state of the world, families grew into tribes, and tribes into nations, and the head of the nation would necessarily combine these offices: hence we may also resolve them into three divisions. He would be priest, prophet and king; according to the second and third offices, governing and teaching his people, and being the lineal conservator, if not the deliverer, of the oracles and promises of God. Such was Melchisedec.

We may here remark the exceedingly high privileges of the first-born, who was the natural heir not only to temporal, but also to spiritual dignities; and may estimate the crime of Esau, who was heir not only to what had been transmitted to Adam, but also to additional promises made to his father, and his father's father.

On coming to the next dispensation, we immediately encounter its characteristic limitation. As the sacrifice is confined to one place, to certain times, to specified sins, so the sacrificer is limited to the first-born of a single family. We also meet with a disruption of the apostolical and pontifical offices, the first being conferred on Moses, the second on Aaron. This was necessary to the more full and perfect development of each during this stage of preparation and foreshadowing. There is also a difference in their transmission, the second being entailed on the first-born of Aaron's family, while the first is not confined either to person or family, but distributed among several at the same time, as between Saul the king, and Samuel the prophet; and indeed Solomon was the last in whom the dignity of rule and gift of prophecy was united. This difference of transmission arose not only from the circumstance of the second being merely passive representation, and therefore affording no reason for departing from the line of succession; and of the first being most active exertion, and therefore requiring qualities which could be maintained in a limited succession only by a continual miracle; but it was designed also to narrow the view down to the one only mediator, who, when once come, could never again be represented by human creature; while in his apostolical character our Lord continued and continues to be represented by a widely spread ministry, deriving commission from him through his apostles. Amidst all his exclusiveness, however, and in the very pages of the book of that law of contraction and constraint, the Jew was warned of the shadowy nature of his priesthood, by the exhibition of that of Melchisedec, who there stands without enumeration of ancestors, so necessary to the genuineness of the Aaronic priest; without time of birth or time of death being stated; without predecessors or successors being specified: and the spiritually minded, no doubt, were instructed by this comparison to expect the passing away of their own priesthood, and look forward to one common to all mankind, and of everlasting duration.

But now those shadowy priests have all vanished, and their substance is come. The first-born among many brethren, the true priest, the true king, the true prophet, has appeared, hath announced pardon from God, and hath offered the sacrifice ordained from the beginning of the world. On earth, and for all men, and not in the temple and for the Jews, the great High Priest hath made his offering; and in heaven, and for all men, and not in the holy of holies, and for the Jews, the great High Priest, in virtue of that offering, is standing with his intercession. There is, therefore, no longer, upon earth, a sacrificing priest; consequently, it is only in his apostolical character that our Saviour can have any representative: generally speaking, he is represented by every one in the Christian Church to whom we are bound to pay obedience or reverence, since, however nature may have invested them with claims to such, yet they derive a new and higher title from the great head and ruler of all. We must be faithful to our rulers, we must be obedient to our masters, attentive to our teachers, dutiful to our parents, for his sake by whom all these powers are ordained. But more particularly he is represented by the spiritual pastors of his church, whose office, since sacrifice has been finished, and the volume of prophecy sealed, is now confined to the spiritual government and instruction of his church; they form, therefore, a ministry, and not a priesthood: accordingly, they are never once designated in the New Testament (however they may be in later writers) by the word (hiereys) which signifies a sacrificing priest, but are termed bishops or overseers, presbyters or elders, deacons or ministers. The root of all corruption in the church, has been the blasphemous assumption of the sacrificial and mediatorial character, by these representatives of but a portion of even the apostolical.

We will now proceed to examine our own dispensation, under the two heads of its pontifical and apostolical government.

I. The first we have seen to belong to Christ alone; it has been partly fulfilled upon earth, and is still partly fulfilling in heaven. Let us consider our state in this respect, and compare it with that of the Jew, which was one of greater blessedness than that of the Patriarch, inasmuch as a written and recorded warrant and promise of God was more satisfactory than one which was merely traditional, and therefore also not so expressly traced to God's command.

We have seen that Jewish intercession was confined—first, to a certain place; second, to a certain time; third, to a certain person; fourth, to certain sins.

1. The place was the Jewish temple, a building of stones and timber. Intercession, therefore, was subject to all the external accidents. A conflagration might put an end to it, nor could it be renewed, after such an interruption, without fresh warrant from God. Thus the Jew was in spiritual jeopardy every hour; he was, indeed, subject to worldly elements; every threat of the Syrian, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, or the Roman, made him tremble, not only for his temporal, but also spiritual welfare. And it required the uninterrupted and stirring song of prophecy to keep his heart above despair, and assure him against the threatening appearances around. Now turn from this bondage to our liberty. Our temple is heaven; there is our High Priest, far beyond the reach of all the powers of earth or of hell; nay, keeping them in subjection under his feet. Nothing in this world, neither kingdoms, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things upon earth, nor things under the earth, can give us a moment's anxiety.

2. On incurring any sin or impurity, for which his law had provided atonement by sacrifice, the Jew had all the formal, and (unless resident in Jerusalem) tedious and dilatory process to go through, of repairing in person to the temple, of instructing the priest with the occasion of his sacrifice, and then of the ceremonial of the sacrifice. Thus innumerable accidents may intervene to deprive him of restoration to his former state, and the whole nation might be deprived of its imputed character of holiness, be degraded from its glorious state of an assembly of priests and kings, by some worldly incident, preventing the annual celebration of the great day of atonement, on which this nation of exclusive holiness and vaunted privileges was summoned as a criminal before the bar of God, and in the very form of absolution underwent all the solemnities of the passing a sentence of death. In every case, private or public, the offender was left in utter helplessness during the interval between the commission of the offence, and the offering of the sacrifice. No prayer, however humble; no appeal, however earnest, could avail one iota of his contracted uncleanness. For that he must await an external rite in the flesh; his spirit was bound, as it were, to the earth, and was unable to rise until its dull and mortal companion, the body, had gone through certain prescribed forms and motions. Here was rebuke, here was perplexity indeed; and then how limited in every way was the pardon obtained. It went as far as the prescribed form of words put up by the priest, and no further; as far as the remission of the particular offence, and no further; and the continual renewal of sacrifice was required to meet the continually renewed guilt. The law was, indeed, a schoolmaster to bring unto Christ; but it was a stern schoolmaster, whose voice never ceased to chide, whose rigour was ever demanding satisfaction. But we are under no schoolmaster, our spirit is under no bondage. Our sacrifice, full, perfect, and sufficient for all the sins of the whole world, past and to come, has been offered once; and our High Priest's mediation proceeds, from that moment, with unbroken efficacy, to continue until sin with death shall be no more. At every moment, therefore, we can, by appeal to him, obtain the benefits of that sacrifice; at every moment our spirit can rise in prayer, and procure his intercession. We are released from all bondage of the body; time, place, and form, can raise no obstruction to us; we are free, we are spiritual. Tied to the bed of sickness, we are not precluded from our temple; neither prevented from the presence of our priest, who is God over all, blessed for evermore.

3. Jewish intercession could be made only through a descendant of Aaron. Now, though an official succession of men may proceed without interruption, as long as the society or nation in which they are included exists, yet this is far from being the case with family succession, of the termination of which we see instances every day. Here, then, was another point of uncertainty to the Jew. If his temple was brute stones and timber, his priest was frail flesh and blood; and if the axe and firebrand may destroy the one, the sword or the pestilence may extinguish the other. But this was not all the imperfection. His priest, being sinful man, was indebted for the efficacy of his intercession to imputed holiness; and, therefore, in despite of the express covenant of God to accept such mediation, there would arise most uncomfortable doubts upon the following points.

1st. Whether he really was in that state of imputed holiness which was necessary to the efficacy of his mediation. Through neglect, wilful or unintentional, he might have omitted some ceremony prescribed for this purpose; or may have relapsed into a state of defilement since the performance of those ceremonies.

2d. Was he well assured that all in the rite itself of the sacrifice was done according to rule; whether nothing was omitted, or admitted, by which the whole proceeding was vitiated? The number and minuteness of the ceremonial regulations of his law, could not but subject the Jew to perplexing questions of this kind. But our High Priest liveth for evermore: he is purity itself, and therefore has no offering to make for his own sins; he is truth itself, and will therefore sincerely plead: and he is the son of God, and therefore will effectually plead. Nor does this unearthly character preclude us from the assurance of his sympathy,—an assurance so necessary to our confidence in such a mediator; for he took our nature upon him, suffered temptation, underwent our sorrows. Thus every opening is closed against doubt, and we may boldly approach the throne of God, confident of the all-sufficiency in every point, and at every time, of our heavenly and everlasting mediator.

3d. Jewish intercession was applied to particular sins, selected each for a peculiar atonement: and these were rather infirmities than sins, while the greater transgressions were left without the benefit of any rite of absolution. But the pardon procured by the intercession of Christ is not thus confined to any particular infirmity, nor unequal to do away the greater transgressions. It extends to our whole life. Nay, more: it not only annuls the past, but even in the very act creates the future: for with forgiveness for what has been done in sin, it confers the grace to do it in righteousness: and it fills the mind not only with the lightness of heart arising from the having thrown down a burden, but also with the delight experienced from taking up a gift; not only with dismissal of doubt and fear, but with the entertainment of hope and love. Thus its effect pervades the whole mind of man, refining his affections, exalting his thoughts, pacifying the terrors of memory, and presenting views of glory to his foresight.

And now, my brethren, may we not indeed joyfully assent to our Saviour's assertion, "that his burden is light, and his yoke easy!" On this vital point of mediation, how bound in hand and foot did the Jew approach God's altar? What a slave indeed was he! even the most spiritual-minded, they who looked beyond the letter of the law, to whom the law itself furnished elements of thought which carried their minds far beyond its narrow barrier, felt their spirit at every turn opposed by its wall of fleshy ordinances. They were prisoners in a dungeon, who could overhear the glad sounds of life without, and to whom through its loophole there streamed a ray in tantalizing token of the joyous light around. In all their aspirations they were exalted but to be humbled. After their widest spiritual range, they returned (like runaways to their prison) to the distinction of meats, and all the minute and formal observances which God indeed had imposed, but at the same time had informed them, both by the spirit of the very law which bound them, and by the mouths of his prophets, whom he sent, to be intrinsically unnecessary. Amid the multitude of bulls and rams slain in the temple, their reason informed by God, cried out to them that such brute offerings could not avail to take away sin, and his messengers were exclaiming, "to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams;" that "the sacrifice of God was a contrite spirit," and demanded whether "God would drink the blood of bulls, and eat the fat of rams." Thus were they daily rebuked, thus straitened, thus imposed with a hard, and, at the same time, unnecessary task.

What shall we say, then, my brethren, of them who would bring us back into all this jeopardy? And they do bring us back, who invest the human minister of Christ with the mediatorial character; they bring back all the carnal purifications, and all the doubts of efficacy which we saw attendant upon Jewish intercession. Let us stand fast in the liberty with which Christ hath made us free, who is our only mediator and advocate, and who hath once and for ever offered the only sacrifice.

II. Let us now proceed to the apostolical part of our Lord's office in our covenant. As our Lord, though represented in this character by human agents in the two preceding stages, yet did not altogether exclude his own occasional and particular interference as head of the church, but appeared and directed his deputed agents amid mighty and fearful signs and wonders, so, notwithstanding his appointment of apostles and ministers, he did, in the infancy of the Christian church, which called for especial assistance, manifest his open and direct superintendence, as on the day of Pentecost, in the conversion of St. Paul, and other remarkable events of that period. Nor will an attentive and pious mind fail to trace the mighty though secret working of its great superintendent, in the series of events which have befallen his church in later days, however they may assume to a more circumscribed view the shape of effects of ordinary agency; each single event may appear natural, but the series is miraculous.

The ordinary charges, however, of government and instruction, he has deputed to human hands, in analogy with the constitution of human society in general, whose order is maintained by chosen members of itself. These he deputed to his apostles, and their successors for ever; first in the commission which he gave to the twelve and the seventy, and finally, in the moment previous to his ascension, in those memorable words, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo! I am with you, even unto the end of the world."—(Matth. xxviii. 19, 20, To which may be added, Matth. xviii. 18, 19.)

It is then the prophetical part only (taking that word in its wide sense) of his threefold office, which our Lord has deputed to the Christian ministry; the strictly prophetic gift, that of foretelling the future, was indeed imparted, but only for a season. There remain the conservation of his oracles, the teaching of his word, and the government of his church,—all three intimately connected indeed, but yet not so entirely, but that one may devolve to an individual in a much larger proportion than the others: for instance, the conservation of his word will require a more deep and extensive learning, than will be called forth by the ordinary duties of teaching it, since it establishes what the other takes for granted, the authority of Scripture, and authenticity of its documents; while the government of the church again will demand qualities, many of which are not required, and the rest necessary but in an inferior degree, to the mere teacher. To these offices God ordained in his church—first, apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, teachers; then, workers of miracles; after that, gifts of healing, ministers, governors, diversity of tongues. (1 Cor. xii. 28). Into these distinctions it is now unnecessary to enter; we will proceed, therefore, to consider the Christian minister in the general, and first view him in comparison with the Jewish teacher.

1. He had a predecessor in the Jewish prophet, in common with whom he has to uphold the honour and glory of God, amid an unbelieving generation. He has to unfold his blessings given and to be given,—to signify his everlasting counsels,—to promise pardon and peace, or to denounce judgment and woe,—to publish unwelcome truths,—to appear before kings and rulers,—to rebuke the impenitent Ahab,—to comfort the pious Hezekiah. But far more excellent than the heralds of the Christ who was coming, is the ambassador of the Christ who is come; they saw the ray, these beheld the sun; they preached the hope of things unseen, these announce the substance. They saw in part, and could unfold but in part; these have the whole scheme of God's redemption gloriously unveiled before them. They sang of him who was to come in the flesh, a man of sorrows; these tell of him who is to come at the last day in glory to judge the quick and the dead. If the least in the kingdom of heaven be greater than him who was greater than all the prophets before him,* great indeed may we conclude to be the superiority of the Christian minister to the Jewish prophet.

2. Still higher does he stand than the Jewish priest, to whom was committed the teaching of the law of ordinances, the exposition of the letter;† while the unveiling of the spirit was confined to the prophets. Supposing him, therefore, to act up to the duty of the most faithful expounder of God's word, how narrow after all must have been his views, how timid his exposition. Accustomed himself to officiate in the temple with a number of minutely prescribed ceremonies, and hedged in by the text of the law, which he had to interpret every where by positive injunctions, beyond which he dared not enlarge; can we wonder if he went not beyond the letter which killeth, until, like the captive who hugs his chain, he took delight in narrowing to still greater straitness what was so narrow already; and can we wonder if the people, amid all their stupid carnality, observed a want of freedom and authority in this unedifying literality: such was the Scribe, such the Pharisee, who, in addition, by their pretended traditions, threw a veil still more thick upon the spirit of the word. At other times, the expounder running into the opposite extreme, escaped from the literality of the text into the wilderness of moral allegory, and despising and despised by the vulgar, left his flock still more unedified than the former: such was the Sadducee. But the Christian minister has to expound the liberty of the spirit, and not the slavery of the letter; the spirit of the Gospel, not the letter of the law: for prescribed and outward observances, he has to inculcate inward and essential principles; for formal ethical precepts, he has to infuse energetic spiritual motions. The volume which he interprets, gives his spirit unbounded range; day after day it may feed in fresh pastures, drink from fresh streams, nor can it visit, to his life's end, more than a small portion of the regions open to its excursions: unfettered by distinctions of meat, ablutions of the body, sacrifices of brutes, observance of carnal forms and prescriptions; free from such a body of death, it expatiates over the boundless prospect of the life to come; gazing on the mighty works of its Master and Creator in the spiritual world,—on his conquest over sin and death,—on the assurance of pardon and peace,—on the sanctifying graces of the Holy Spirit,—on the life everlasting. His understanding is in no danger of being led captive by a round of formal duties; for he officiates after no mechanical formulary, he is engaged in no dull handling of earthly elements. The vessels about which he is concerned are living spirits, vessels of the Holy Ghost: the vestments about which he must be careful, are the robes of righteousness: the washings with which he has to do, is the laver of regeneration, and the washing away the filth of a bad conscience: the leprosy on which he has to pronounce, is the leprosy of sin in the soul: the temple in which he ministers, is the church of God,—no building of stones and timber, but an assembly of living spirits: the altar at which he ministers, is not made of earth, but is spiritual, set up in the heart of the spiritual man: the sacrifice which he offers, is no shedding of the blood of bulls and goats, but is the communion of the body and blood of Christ, taken to the soul with praise and thanksgiving. The knowledge required by his office, is no minute and barren information on rites and ceremonies, it is the knowledge of the heart of man, and of the spirit of God: of the heart of man, in order to detect all its windings and turnings, and so dispel all its delusions and perverseness, and for which purpose is demanded the constant watching of his own: of the spirit of God, in order to be able faithfully to unfold his will and counsel, for which purpose he must diligently search the Scriptures in study, in meditation, and in prayer. All the duties, including even the teaching of the Jewish priest, were confined to the temple, and these in fit analogy with his temporal covenant, were but for a season: on the expiration of his course, he returned to his proper city, to a life of religious ease and calm. But the house of prayer contains but a fragment of the services of the Christian minister. His commission comes direct from heaven, and not from Mount Sinai; and the only temple which includes his possible duties is the wide earth. He preaches the covenant made with all mankind, and not with Abraham only; and deputed by the great Melchisedec, has his charge open to every tribe and nation. His commission is to "go, teach all nations." He blows a trumpet not on Sion only, but in the whole earth, and proclaims to all mankind the acceptable year, the last jubilee.

Such is the minister of the Gospel, compared with the minister of the law. And if deep responsibility confer honour, if the alternative of the highest crown of reward, or lowest degradation of punishment bestow importance, then indeed is the former character one of exceeding dignity: but it is a dignity under which man will tremble, and not triumph; will humble himself, and not exalt. He is not a master amid his brethren, but a spiritual servant, to diligently watch and provide for their wants, and be within the continual call of their spiritual necessities. The greater his talents the more extensive is the service which he is bound to yield; and he must put the whole man, in body, soul, and mind, to the work; adding to faith diligence, and to diligence knowledge; so that by labouring for the salvation of others, he even thus strives to attain his own. His very growth in usefulness and diligence will also increase his growth in humility and lowliness of spirit, since his sphere of duty thus enlarged brings into view more and more to be done, and makes what is done appear more and more inadequate to that which ought to be done. Well may he exclaim, in the words of the apostle, "Who is sufficient?" (2 Cor. ii. 16,) many and manifold are the tempers and qualities which he must bring to his work. He is a soldier ever engaged in a spiritual warfare; yea, and a captain in that warfare. He must have unwearied circumspection; be ready against open attack, watchful against secret assault, set the first and best examples of patience and hardihood, perseverance and courage, and guide and sustain all committed to his charge, in every trial of weariness, of famine, of the sword. Then again, he is a shepherd, whose flock is feeding far and wide, over which he must watch by day, that is, in easy times, lest they extend their pasture into the wilderness, and be lost; and which he must gather carefully by night, when times of difficulty are come, and watch lest the wolf assail the fold. He is a husbandman also, whom God hath put into his vineyard, where he must labour diligently; digging, watering, and dressing, that his master may receive fruit plentifully. He is a builder, too, a builder of God's temple, of his holy church; of which he must study well the plan, must accurately acquaint himself with it, putting into practice all his knowledge, judgment, and charity, so that he may build in unison, finish his portion in harmony with the glorious whole; working, as he does, in co-operation with builders of different quarters of the earth, of different ages; with builders of this world, with builders of the world to come. He is a fisher too, but a fisher of men, whom he must gather into the ship of salvation from the depths of sin and corruption; and must fearlessly pursue his occupation by day and by night, be the waters of the world troubled or still, reckless of its monsters below, unappalled by its pirates above. When engaged on shore, it will be in mending his nets, that is, in repairing his shaken fortitude, his fainting perseverance, his failing powers of persuasion, his exhausted knowledge. Again we may exclaim, "Who is sufficient?" not the will of man, but the grace of God.

Thus have I endeavoured, to the best of my power, to draw out before you, in pursuance of my plan, a sketch of the priesthood of the Church of God, and especially, by a comparison of the Christian priesthood with such as preceded it, to show how blessed are we in having been planted in the church of the latter days. In this, as in the former respects, it maintains its striking superiority: we are brought nearer to the Father of Spirits, and endued with far higher graces, and more lofty privileges. In our blessed Saviour,—having died for our sins, and risen again for our justification,—we have a priesthood, through whom we confidently approach the throne of grace and mercy; not with the timid crouching of the pardoned slave, but with the generous openness of the accepted son. And in his deputed ministers we have guides and instructors on the road of salvation, whom he hath endued with powers and opportunities for their charge, such as were never committed to human hands before. Not a single want is left unsatisfied: we are a people fully equipped, furnished for our journey with all appliances. Our march through this wilderness of the world is supplied with spiritual manna from heaven; our steps, through this darkness of sin and woe, are directed by a spiritual fire. Let us not provoke God by ingratitude, and fall in the wilderness; but strive to enter the promised land, which Israel won only in the flesh, but which awaits the faithful Christian in the spirit.

DISSERTATION VIII.

ON PRAYER.

Unto him that hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God, and his Father: to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever.—Rev. i. 5, 6.

In this passage, and in two others in the New Testament, (Rev. v. 9, 10; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9,) Christians are termed priests: we shall understand the application of this term by attending to the following considerations.

I. The word here translated priest, is not presbyter, but means a sacrificing priest. But such a priest, with the exception of our Saviour, does not exist in the Christian Church, still less can the term be applied to Christians in general; it is, therefore, figurative, as the word "kings" obviously is.

II. The figurative sense is clearly determined: first, from a parallel passage in the Old Testament, (Exod. xix. 6,) where God says to the Jews, "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation." Now to the Jew, having an established priesthood, the term, thus applied, was clearly metaphorical; and, familiar as it was, would convey the notion of selection, consecration, sacrifice. With regard to the first and second, every Jew was a figurative priest, from his selection from the rest of the world, and by the imputed holiness consequent on this selection; of this he was put in mind by the numerous ordinances to remedy uncleanness, both in individuals and the whole nation, by which he was rendered fit to appear before God, just as his real priest was qualified for his duties by purifications. With regard to his sacrifice, we have only to see to what things Scripture applies this figure; and on turning over its pages we find mention of the sacrifice of praise,[*] of thanksgiving,[†] of repentance,[‡] of righteousness,[||] of charity;[§] and as all these, outwardly and inwardly, are comprised in prayer, in which we peculiarly make an offering of our thoughts and deeds, our souls and bodies, to God, we may understand, in one word, prayer to be this figurative sacrifice.

What was applicable to the Jew, is, of course, still more so to the Christian, who is also selected from the rest of the world, (Rom. xii. 1, 2,) has been washed and consecrated in the laver of regeneration, which confers purity by virtue of the sacrifice of Christ; even as the prescribed sacrifices of purification, and especially that of the day of atonement, obtained it for the Jew. This is the consecration by which he ministers, and in all the above-mentioned passages of the New Testament, our spiritual priesthood is mentioned as a consequence of our Redeemer's sacrifice. We are "a holy priesthood," says St. Peter, "to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, through Jesus Christ." And our sacrifice, as in the case of the Jew, will be prayer, proceeding from unfeigned lips, and from a clean conscience. And this our daily sacrifice has the same relation to the sacrifice of Christ, as our figurative priesthood to his real. In the offering of the one we obtain the benefit of his sacrifice, in the character of the other we gain the intercession of his priesthood.

And now, is it not grievous to think, my brethren, that, while prayer is ascending every day from millions of bosoms, so few, comparatively, should be qualified to offer it? All are not within the covenant of Christ; therefore, they cannot be spiritual priests. They have had no consecration, they stand not within the temple, which is the Church of Christ.

But of those who do stand within the temple, are all indeed qualified? Are they truly thankful, truly penitent, truly resolved upon holiness of life; truly impressed with the efficacy of the intercession of the great High Priest? With such a mind must they come, in such robes must they minister, such incense must they burn, such sacrifice must they offer. This most important duty of prayer, this high privilege of the church of God, it is now my intention to discuss; and before proceeding after my plan, to compare the different stages of that church under this head, I will pause to explain more exactly its nature.

As in sacrifice the victim became peculiarly the property of God, so in the sacrifice of prayer we peculiarly abstract our spirit from the world, and yield it up to God; and we may define prayer to be the communion of our souls with God, by the lifting up of our hearts, either with the words of the lips, or in the aspirations of silence. And as communion with God is the great end of our being, it is plain that to this act we must bring the whole man, with all his gifts, helps, knowledge, faculties, and privileges. This act, therefore, is the putting forth of our powers of the spiritual life, of which we are then conscious, in the same way as we are of our mental, when we task our memory, or exercise our reflection; as we are of our bodily, when we move a hand or foot. We are then, and only then, in the full enjoyment of all our blissful powers of existence. All the rest of our time is like the rest and the sleep, so necessary to our imperfect frame of body and mind. And if, in the body, our waking hours influence our sleep, furnishing the mind with its peculiar train of dreaming thought, shall not these waking hours of our spirit influence the rest of our life? What trains of glorious and blessed meditation shall they not leave behind? Into what an excellent arrangement of high and solemn thought shall they not have framed the mind, which, when shut out from this its more immediate connexion with the world of spirits, may, in the dream of earthly life, retain and feed upon its waking recollections. Oh! sluggard, indeed, is he, who is unwilling to awake to so glorious a day!

This communion with God implies, of course, the unreserved opening of our hearts to him. If a single cell be kept closed, it is a wall of partition between us. Then it is, therefore, that we ascertain whereabouts we are amid the wide regions of existence; then we try and search our spirit; then we sound the depth of our affections; then, like blossoms to the sun, we put forth all our understanding, all our imagination, all our memory,—exercise all the prerogatives given us above the rest of the tribes of creation, as being formed in the image of God. Then, therefore, it is, that coming to a full knowledge of ourselves, and having our faculties quickened, we acutely discern and condemn our unholiness and infirmities; then we acknowledge and confess our unworthiness; and then we perceive distinctly the unbounded mercies of God, and rise from fear, and sorrow, and doubt,—to hope, and love, and joy. Then our connexion with the world to come, our prize of immortality, is distinctly assured. Then is a conversation going on between us and our God, between the creator and the thing created, between the giver and the receiver, between immortality and mortality; and as the one opens his bosom, the other pours forth his treasure into it; as the one offers homage and allegiance, the other dispenses his royal bounties. Such communion have we with God, through our high priest, Jesus Christ, being consecrated priests for that purpose by his sacrifice; and such, in the prospective virtue of that sacrifice, and through the medium of representation, had the Jew.

Prayer consists of confession of sin, of thanksgiving for mercies, of petition for either the continuance or increase of blessings, of deprecation for the removal or assuagement of afflictions. These last depend entirely for their success on the sincerity of the two first, and obtain it immediately, or at a distance, according to circumstances. In many cases, and those the most important, by God's blessed economy, the very act of prayer obtains the petition. The mind is brought, by praying, further and further into a state of spiritual blessedness, until, at length, the utterance of the lips, entreating comfort and deliverance from temptation, becomes rather the expression of the heart, which at that moment has found what, a moment before, it had not, than of a sense of its destitution. For we are then in God's temple; priests ministering at his altar, with eyes and ears intent upon our duty. The noisy world is shut out, and its affliction cannot reach him whose mind is thus excluded, and in a state of bliss and unchangeableness. Temptation dares not, any more than its evil author, intrude before the presence of God. Other objects of prayer will require time, because they admit of degrees of perfection, and can come but by repeated prayer. Such are a certain amount of grace, of knowledge, of wisdom; a portion of which, insensible, perhaps, at the time, is imparted at every earnest prayer: and if we have faith and patience to persevere to the end, we shall obtain more than we, in the first instance, imagined to desire; while one desire, satisfied, will awake another to be satisfied, and improvement lead on to more improvement. Others, again, as most temporal objects, must be prayed for in such a manner as must interpose delay. We are bidden to ask the greater, in order to obtain the less; the heavenly, in order to obtain the earthly. Thus they will seldom come immediate or singular, but in their appropriate season, and with their due concomitants. For example, in asking for length of life, our prayer will not be directed to the longer enjoyment of it, but to our being enabled to bring to a ripe conclusion the great work of life,—our own sanctification. If we ask for fruitful seasons, we shall not have in our minds the luxurious ease and plenty which they supply; but the peace, the charity, the holy leisure, the thankfulness, and dedication of heart to God, in all hope and joy, which they are apt to diffuse among us. If we ask for peace, then the peace of our particular time and nation will come included under the peace of the reign of the prince of peace, when not only the body, but the spirit too, shall have peace. If we entreat for relations and friends, it will be for them as intimate fellow-members of Christ's church, and, therefore, for their spiritual health and wealth, in the train of which their temporal shall follow also. Thus we shall, in all things, obey our Lord's charge, "to pray first for the kingdom of God, and his righteousness;" and we shall reap his promise also, and find all corresponding temporal blessings added unto them.

According to the view which we have taken, prayer is a special privilege accorded to men by express revelation. This will further appear if we consider the requisites to its efficacy.

I. It requires a special promise on the part of God to hear it, and a knowledge of his attributes by which to shape it. To prove this we have only to turn to those among the heathen, whose very investigations into the natures of God and man, led them to conclude the inefficacy of prayer, when addressed to the supreme God, and to betake themselves to the gods of their country as mediators between him and them. The notion which they had formed of him being derived from a severe process of abstraction from every thing human, elevated indeed the understanding, but repelled the feelings. There was nothing in their notion of him to which they could plead. If he was almighty and all-wise, he was also passionless and unchangeable. Hence the philosopher contented himself with the conception of this being.

II. As prayer is the opening of the heart to God, telling out its hopes and fears, these must have some object presented by God; for the telling out of hopes and fears on purely worldly matters, is unworthy the name. But how, without revelation, shall man have these spiritual objects? Another life must be revealed, forgiveness of sins must be revealed. These hold out the only lasting objects of hope and fear to the human mind; nor without the knowledge of these has he either the wish or the permission to approach with prayer, properly so called.

III. The mind must have some manifest acts or words of God upon which to plead, some embodying, as it were, of his abstract attributes: the world indeed is full of his wondrous works, but yet, as we know from the case of the heathen, they do not come home to men's minds in that individual shape which alone can interest them. They seem, also, matters of course, and may, as far as they know, administer to other beings specially, to themselves but accidentally. They are, too, as far as they affect them, but of the present hour. Now to their view whom he hath called by revelation, he has proposed mighty deeds of the past, wrought in especial interventions; and again, by means of prophecy, fixed their eyes on glorious works of mercy to come: so that wherever in time the mind may place itself,—in past, present, or future,—the sight is full of objects displaying, and particularly directing upon the beholder himself, the wisdom, the goodness, and the power of God; not in abstract, but in substance.

Let us now proceed to examine the comparative advantages of the Patriarch, Jew, and Christian. The Patriarch had from the mouth of Adam an account of the blissful days of Paradise, and of the intervention of God at the fall; he had also, from the same source, the prophecy announcing his restoration, so that his retrospect and prospect was bright with heart-stirring operations of God in his especial behalf; and these imparted their appropriate colour to the present and ordinary works of God lying before his eyes. Thus his matter was abundant; his heart had sufficient upon which to plead.

But comparatively with the Jew, he was distant indeed. This favoured worshipper could call upon the Almighty as having announced himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, his fathers. God had intervened, by a long series of most signal and glorious mercies, and held up to his eyes a long and burning train of prophecy, growing more specific every day. The very land in which he was living, was a testimony and pledge of his peculiar mercy and love; and all the temporal blessings which it afforded him, came thus specially from God's hands, and mingled harmoniously with the great mass of spiritual mercies, past and to come. He was a priest indeed, with innumerable offerings to lay upon God's altar; the dedicatory sacrifice of Solomon did not more exceed in magnificence that of Abel, than the spiritual sacrifice of the Jew, considered under the head of matter for prayer, did that of the patriarch. How beautiful, how glorious are his prayers; the great body of them is still put up by the church of God, which is still in the enjoyment of his blessings.

But how distant indeed was he compared with the Christian; the Christian has all the glorious past, present, and future of the Jew in retrospect. But above all, God has appeared to him not through angels, not from Mount Sinai, but in human flesh, in domestic life. The Christian can appeal to him on human attributes, on the love which he himself entertains; on the mercy which he himself shows; on the justice which he himself administers. He can appeal to one who has called himself not the God of his fathers, but his brother: so that our High Priest mediates not only directly and officially by his human nature, but also incidentally and instrumentally by his human qualities; by means of which we can feel ourselves one with him who is one with the Father. Our retrospect, in addition to the Jewish, is his incarnation and whole sojourn on earth; his crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension. Our present view is his sitting at the right hand of God in mediation for us, together with all the gifts pouring down on us in his name; our prospect is his coming again in judgment, and the life everlasting, when all his glorious promises, still due, shall have been fulfilled. Priests, spiritual priests indeed are we, rich beyond all telling in the abundance of offerings for our sacrifice; and we have received a fresh and special ordination from God in those words, (Job xvi. 23), "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he shall give it you." In addition to all this, he has provided us one whose help shall never fail to make our sacrifice perfect, the advocacy of the Holy Spirit, which intercedeth for us with groans which cannot be uttered.

To illustrate by example this our blessed superiority, let us take up the most fervent, the most explicit of such Jewish prayers as are still at this very day used by the church of Christ; and let us, if possible, divest ourselves, during the perusal, of our Christian associations. Let what was dark to the Jew, be dark to us; let the great Redeemer be obscurely future, and not gloriously come. Do we not appear far away, even where the Jew felt himself to be most near? Now let us take up the prayer again with our eyes open, and our heart quick to all our spiritual happiness; read it, and then close with the words, "through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour." Are we not brought near at once, taken up like Elijah from earth, caught up like the apostle to the third heaven? Here is indeed one great reason, exclusive of the intrinsic merits of the hymns, why the Christian church has retained so much of the praise and prayer of the Jewish. To all who are diligent to understand, it carries back the thoughts to the glorious train of mercies by which God prepared the way of our dispensation, reminds us of our eminently superior privileges, and every expression comes to the heart with a sense of glorious prophecy most gloriously fulfilled, and with the consciousness of ourselves being the blissful enjoyers of the fulfilment.

Such being our means, let us examine our duty on the head of prayer, which we shall distinguish into private and public.

Most of what may be said (on the first especially) has been already anticipated. We have been both commanded and invited to pray. Prayer is to us the only channel of communication with God,—the only duty in which we pointedly fulfil the purpose of our being,—the only acknowledged vehicle of his gifts,—the only refuge from a corrupt and troublous world. Without it the word of God, sown by his teachers, has no ground in the heart wherein to take root; without it we are mere animals, beasts of the earth, creatures of rapine and prey.

The transition to the consideration of the objects of public prayer, is short and easy, from some principal duties of private. In his private petitions, the individual must never forget that he is one of many, a member of a body, through the head of which he has access to the throne of grace and mercy. He is bound to many brethren in the unity of one altar, one faith, one baptism; so that his prayers must be directed to their welfare as to a part of his own, and even the most special and private part of his devotions cannot leave his neighbour out of all consideration. To them his conduct for good or bad can never be indifferent, bodily or morally; and therefore his petitions for grace to amend his life before God, will include the desire of avoiding offence before men; with the earnest wish to build up his fellows in redemption, so that every thing which he may think, say or do, may tend to the glory of God and his Saviour Jesus Christ. Here then is a close, indissoluble bond between private and public prayer. Private must proceed upon the understanding that its offerer is a member of a society, and to this society he cannot be counted to belong, if he shun its assemblies. He cannot put up petitions for the brethren in spirit, if he avoids their spiritual communion. This would be like thinking to love God whom he hath not seen, and hating his brother whom he hath seen. Both modes of prayer are necessary from the very constitution of our nature as social beings, both are imposed by Christ's ordinance, both are blessed with his promise. Just as the Jewish priest united his public and private devotions, and offered first for himself, and then for the people; so closely united must the truly spiritual priest maintain his private and public offices, nor deem that one will be accepted when the other is neglected. If he unite not the two, he is no priest; he has no altar, no sacrifice, no temple.

To be in communion, therefore, with the invisible church, we must be in communion with the visible; to be in communion with Jesus Christ its great head, with all the angelic host of heaven, with the spirits of just men made perfect, we must also be in communion with the brethren who are labouring together with ourselves in the infirmities of the flesh, and looking for help to the same Redeemer.

For this assembling ourselves together we have the special promise of our Lord, that where two or three are met together in his name, there is he in the midst of them; and for neglecting such assembling, we have his threats of casting us out of his church; for in his Epistle to the Hebrews, the apostle of Christ strictly charges them not to neglect the assembling of themselves, and proceeds to show that such neglect is the commencement of an apostacy, after which there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin. Now, he is writing to persons who were in danger of this sin from the violence of persecution without. Will it be more excusable in us, who commit it from inward choice? In them the spirit was willing, but the flesh weak; in us not even the spirit will be willing, and the flesh will be proud and rebellious. They would err from severe compulsion of pain; we from mere recklessness and wantonness of ease.

The benefits of public prayer may be discussed as received through the outward, and through the inward, senses.

Much indeed comes through the outward. Not derived from the beauty and magnificence of the temple; not from showy pomp of ceremonial; not from charms of song and music, and other stimulants to the dull senses, which rouse them indeed to a certain degree, but often prevent them effectually from rising higher, by constantly rivetting the attention, and intruding objects of the senses on the moments of abstraction,—the sights and sounds of earth on the contemplation of heaven, flesh upon spirit. But that which delights and teaches the eyes, is the sight of Christ's flock; that which charms and instructs the ears, is the sound of joint prayer. When we thus join ourselves in uniformity and equality of prayer, all of different stations, different pursuits, different dispositions, different ages,—the rich and the poor, the merchant and the husbandman, the wise and the weak, the healthy and the infirm, the young and the old,—what a varied family does that of Christ appear; how manifold are our wants, and how surpassingly great his power and loving-kindness who undertakes to supply them all,—who sheds upon each of them his appropriate gift, and they all, in different tongues as it were, tell out the mighty works of God. And when in despite of all the obvious differences in the flesh, we find ourselves, by the very act of our meeting, all equal and alike before the throne of God, what should we reckon of such differences, but as mere accidents, utterly inessential to our real nature? If God, who made us, and knows our nature to its inmost recesses, regard them not, why shall we so painfully attend to them? Such differences, however, will act still more beneficially, if they act but as outward fleshly signs, to lead us to think of most important inward spiritual differences; of growth or diminution of grace, of wealth, of poverty, of spiritual knowledge, of performance or neglect of God's will, of the understanding or ignorance of his word, of the subjection or dominion of the flesh, of the willingness or reluctance of the spirit. These distinctions are indeed essentials, and no accidents. On either consideration, the world and its code is set aside; and faith and hope and charity bring together, whom its fraud, its hatred, and violence, would fain keep asunder. Here, therefore, all boasting of the flesh is humbled, all meekness of spirit is exalted. With regard to the inward, as the very sight of assembled men is delightful to him who has been long solitary, so is the joining of our spirits in prayer to each one after an interval of lonely meditation and prayer. We refresh ourselves, as it were, with conversation, and with the exercise of our social faculties after seclusion, and the exclusive indulgence of our individual. And assuredly, if interchange of thought, mutual converse and debate, the participation of pleasure and instruction, the imparting of advise and comfort, form the essentials of worldly conversations,—so do the conscious expression of mutual wants, confession of common sins, partaking of common forgiveness, consolation, and peace, give its value and character to our spritual conversation. Such conversation is that which pervades the society of the church of Christ, at those seasons when it assembles as distinctly such, as having separated itself from the world and its lusts and cares, and thus put itself into exclusive unison with its head, forsaking all for Him, and anticipating its future blissful estate, when, without a spot or wrinkle on her garments, she shall be united a glorious bride to the heavenly bridegroom, never to be put asunder, At her time of public prayer alone can she enjoy an unmixed foretaste of her future bliss and peace; at that time alone can each of her members be certain of enjoying spiritual fellowship with his brethren of the life to come. Then all the hindrances which the world interposes to the unity of spirit are removed; the disruption of the bonds of peace is closed up, for its passions and its assaults are at least for a time put aside; then the social joy of the spirits of the saints is unfettered; then the charity, which is the prelude to the links of love which shall bind the blessed in the world to come, is assured. We are all one with each other, by being one with him, who is one with the Father.

Can any one therefore imagine that he shall attain to the fellowship of the saints in light in the life to come, who despises its preparatory elements in this life; can he indeed entertain any adequate notion of it; nay, can he have ever entertained any notion at all? It is easy for any one to remark upon the general appearance of a congregation, and demand what ought he to conclude from its prevailing listlessness and inattention; whether it be really that body which I have been describing, or an assemblage of unsanctified flesh and blood; and ask, if the latter, what becomes of the duty which has been enjoined as so imperative? The person who is thus prejudiced, before he enters the house of prayer, is destitute of the charity which he should carry thither in order to enjoy its benefits; and he, who having entered, is at leisure to remark upon his neighbours, has gone thither to as little purpose. But were it certain that there was but one, even one only, who was sincere in his attendance there, this would not excuse his neglect; with that one brother he may have joined his spirit, and where even two or three are met together in Christ's name, there is he amidst them. To excuse himself therefore at all, this person must be certain that not one single supplicant in the house of prayer is sincere. It may be asserted that a supposition so dreadfully uncharitable could never enter into the mind of a man who was in the least capable of sharing any spiritual intercourse with a brother; hardened must be the heart, and blinded indeed the understanding, of such an arguer. The world had never before received such an invitation to public prayer as our Saviour has given in his memorable promise just quoted. How different from the authoritative injunction upon the Jew. "Three times a year shall thy males appear before me!" And how different the mode of his presence! Not as to a gross people, in the substance of a sensible glory, but as to a spiritual people, in the spirit; not limited to place, as that was to the temple; not limited to time, as the approach to that was. The Jew was told to fear the Lord his God, as a servant. We are bidden to love the Lord our God, as sons. He, therefore, was commanded to approach, as to a haughty and imperious king, through a long series of formal delays interposed by ceremonies of purification and sacrifice. But us he calls immediately to his presence, as a parent his children: our purification has been made by washing of the Holy Spirit; our sacrifice has been offered by our High Priest Jesus Christ; and his ears are ever open to our prayers.

DISSERTATION IX.

ON REPENTANCE.

When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive.—Ezek. xviii. 27.

The Jewish prophet has here furnished a complete definition of repentance, applicable to every period of the church of God. According to this, it consists of two parts; one of which is the turning away from his wickedness, the other is the doing that which is lawful and right: in other words, it implies the turning away from the world, and the turning towards God. And he has crowned his statement with a declaration of the blessing which God has promised upon such a change, even of the salvation of the sinner, through the remission of his sins. These three heads of this most important doctrine must be carefully distinguished, because they have no necessary connexion with each other, none which man's reason could lead him to discover. It is God's free mercy which binds them together,—it is his revelation which assures us of their union; and the knowledge and acknowledgment of their connexion is one among those vital differences which have ever distinguished the sons of God from the children of the world, which set apart the sons of Shem from the sons of Ham, the Israelite from the Gentile, and the Christian from the Heathen.

That this is the nature of their connexion, will appear from a very few considerations.

I. A man may forsake former sins, and yet not turn to God. The world, at some point or other, ever disgusts its votaries; ever, if they live but long enough to make a certain progress in its delights; and the same palling satiety which has dismissed successive objects of appetite, at length takes away the appetite itself. But many circumstances continually intervene to abridge or prevent so long an indulgence of sin. Men are deterred by a sense of their own interest,—by a regard to worldly reputation,—by apprehension of temporal consequences,—by accidents which put it out of their power, however the will may be at hand, such as want of means, absence, infirmity, old age. In all such cases, the foregoing of sin is no more an act of obedience to God, than is its termination at their death, which cuts off all opportunities of sin at once and for ever. Sin, which would supply a particular gratification to the body, is renounced in favour of a superior gratification, or is put beyond their reach. Nay, men may not only abandon sin, but even be sorry for it, without turning to God. Its consequences may be such as to make them ashamed of their folly, to smart under chastisement, and therefore to loathe the remembrance of it, deeming it a grievous and intolerable burden. And yet this shall amount to nothing better than the painful and distracting feeling of remorse, which arises from the consciousness of having wilfully thrown away our own happiness. Thus far went Cain, thus far went Pharaoh, thus far went Saul, thus far went Judas; yea, and thus far went even the devils in hell, and are going still farther,—and yet to all eternity will never arrive at the second stage of repentance. So far from it, that their deepening remorse only deepens the depth of that tremendous gulf which separates them from the bliss of God's presence. Though, therefore, sorrow for sin be indeed in the road to repentance, we no more on that account advance towards it, than we do to the leading object of a road, by merely being upon it. Though it be indeed the first step, we no more on that account pass beyond, than the person who chances to place his foot on the lowest step of the flight of stairs which leads to the door of God's temple, therefore enters it. That step we may have taken to avoid the pressure of a crowd, or to abridge our road; and, lying in a frequented thoroughfare, it may be trodden in the course of the day by thousands, not one of whom turns to tread the next above. Yet how common is the error of mistaking this kind of sorrow for a godly sorrow; and how many have deemed themselves at peace with God, merely because they were at war with the world.

II. Neither is there any necessary connexion between addressing ourselves to God, and obtaining his forgiveness. Gross and carnal minds may indeed imagine that God's indignation may, like the wrath of proud and vengeful man, be appeased by sorrow and submission, or even be bought off by costly offerings. But acute and disciplined intellects arrive at a very different conclusion. They see in God a power, which has no need of sympathizing with the weakness of man; a holiness, which can admit of no compromise with unholiness; a supremacy, which can brook no particle of rebellion; a justice, which cannot take into favour an offender; and a mercy, which, in the narrow glimpses obtained by them, serves but to perplex and confound them, seeing it shed the rain upon the just and upon the unjust. How shall they hence conclude the forgiveness of sin? Such men, therefore, in their sorrow for the commission of sin, would rather turn away from God than seek him, unless it be natural for man to seek punishment. Revelation it is, (as we have before shown,) which alone assures us that the turning to God shall win his forgiveness.

The mercy of God, thus stepping into these two intervals, and thus blending into one, what were otherwise utterly unconnected, now gives rise to two considerations; first, on the general promise of pardon to the penitent, and next, on God's special call upon the individual to turn and repent.

I. The revelation of forgiveness on repentance is necessarily coeval with the church of God, which is founded upon it; its declaration comes to us included in the promise, made to Adam, of a Redeemer; nor had Adam been in a fit state to be party to the covenant into which God then entered with him, were he not in a state of penitence. The promise was farther daily repeated to him in the typical rite of sacrifice, which he daily, with contrite confession of sin, offered for himself and his family, and which was thus, at once, an assurance and a vehicle of pardon: we need not then go farther to seek instances of this doctrine in the patriarchal church, and will only quote the beautiful passage of Job, in which it is so affectingly put forth. "If thou prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands towards him; if iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles; then truly shalt thou lift up thy face without spot, and shalt be stable, and shalt not fear, but thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that are past."—(xi. 13, &c.) We need not seek instances of its declaration in the next covenant, when God, not only through the daily sacrifice, but also through the mouth of his prophets, was calling his people to repent and be forgiven; how completely it was declared, the passage, chosen for the text, bears witness. All that remained obscure was the cause for which God bestoweth this precious boon of pardon, and this portion flashed into glorious and dazzling light by the revelation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Being the very fundamental doctrine of his church, God has solemnly promulgated it at the opening of each new dispensation; and this was still more necessary, because at those periods mankind had fallen into a very general apostacy. Noah, a preacher of righteousness, proclaimed it before the flood, which began a new stage of the patriarchal church. Israel was commanded, on the day previous to the delivery of the law from Mount Sinai, to sanctify himself for to-day and to-morrow, and wash his clothes, (Exod. xix. 10.)* in which charge, assuredly, every pious mind would understand much more than a dress of outward purity, in which to appear before the visible glory of the Lord God of Hosts. He would understand that the heart must be clean, and not the garments only; and how shall the heart be cleansed, but by repenting and turning unto God? We ourselves are praising and imploring God under that very covenant, whose harbinger cried out to the whole world, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand!" and, at a signal time, indeed, was this proclamation made; the whole world, Jewish and Gentile, was apostate, while the last veil was going to be taken off from God's mystery of salvation; the real substantial sacrifice was going to be offered, mankind was going to be openly, palpably, convicted of sin, by the suffering of the promised Redeemer on the cross. Men are, therefore, by this last proclamation, called to repentance, in such a manner as they never were before; and such as neglect its summons will sin in such a manner as never did offender before.

II. But vain had been the warning voice of proclamation, had God gone no farther; it had, indeed, been a voice crying in the wilderness, it had been a shouting in the ears of the deaf, it had been commanding the dead to rise, without imparting to them the power of life. But God, in calling upon man to repent, has also enabled him to do it by special means, which it is now time to consider.

So little is man able to furnish himself with the requisite means, so entirely do they come from God, that in more places than one Scripture mentions repentance as a gift of God: it is so, in whatever way we view it.

I. Let us view it as supplied by the channel of the ordinary visitations of Providence. God, at the very moment of turning the Christian's face away from the world by any visitation, invites him by the act to turn it upon himself in heaven. This should seem to be as necessary an alternative as darkness and light. To him, therefore, God makes immediate appeal in every event which raises his dissatisfaction with the world; and the visitation, however temporally severe, is spiritually considered a gift of golden price indeed. The wounds inflicted are but the openings through which he pours in his oil and balm. And not only does he call us to himself by calling us away, by dissatisfaction with the world, by sickness, want, sorrow, and anguish; but oftentimes also by a spirit-stirring note, which completely draws off our attention for the time from the voice of the world, he invites us directly to himself,—by unhoped for restoration to health or wealth, unexpected rescue from danger, unlooked for happiness, and by innumerable occurrences in which the thankful and devout heart is ready to acknowledge God's special intervention. And thus it is, that, on this side and on that, above and below, trumpeted heralds of God are set to summon us to repentance; and if we neither hear them nor see them, we have foregone the commonest principles of our spiritual nature; we have subdued even that elementary curiosity which is necessary to the maintenance of its existence; we have severed the golden chain by which God would hold us to him, in our wanderings in this wilderness below.

II. It will appear still more specially a gift, if we proceed from the consideration of these loud and obvious calls, to that of the still small voice by which he sometimes addresses us much more effectually. These occasions are far more numerous than the world is apt to imagine. How often can a man date his change of heart, and turning to God, from something which, to all other eyes, and even to his own, at any other time, appears trivial and inadequate to so great a consequence; but what more trivial than a burning bush: yet God was in that bush, speaking to the salvation of Israel; and here is God, in the occurrence, calling the sinner to escape from his worse than Egyptian bondage. An object contemplated but with passing attention; a word from a person not looked up to with any particular reverence; a trifling accident in our way which we scarce recked of; a passage of Scripture fraught with no obviously superior importance, and turned out by apparently the merest chance; these have often been the holy ground on which God hath chosen that His spirit should meet our spirit: and what had else suggested but a random, momentary thought, being now the vehicle of his grace, has entered, abided, and leavened the whole mass of feeling and of understanding. Of such vehicles of God's preventing grace, who has not heard from the testimony of others; of their existence who can doubt, if he attend to the internal motions of his mind, and observe how continually our thoughts arise, independent of any call of our own? Some one may here object, that if this grace of God calling us to repentance, be thus independent of us, what need have we to exert ourselves; why not sit down, and await at leisure its proper and appointed season? It is not here the place to canvass the ways by which God works together with us: how the free agency of the latter is the instrument of the former, and the constraint of God is the choice of man. It will be sufficient to ask, whoever delayed to raise his hand, or stir his foot, from the conviction that God's operation was necessary to enable him so to do. Experience, in this case, has certified to us that we can so do, and God's express promise in the other ought equally to assure us that our exertion will be attended with God's co-operation. If God sometimes calls us when not exerting ourselves, what is this but an argument that he will so much the more assist us when we are exerting ourselves? If God sometimes intervenes to insert a holy thought in a train not directed to him, will he not ever sanctify with his grace a train which is directed to him? If a grain of wheat chance to spring up occasionally in our field, shall we, therefore, neglect to sow? The instances which prove to us the preventing grace of God, should, in like manner, stir us up to ensure it by those exertions by which we are conscious, through God's promise, that we can. Sinners, indeed, often find themselves so far fallen away, as to feel convinced that nothing less than some special intervention of God can recall them: they become, therefore, desperate. And yet which of them, in a long and dangerous sickness, from which he felt that nothing less than God's special mercy could raise him, ever neglected all human means of restoration to health? Much more reasonably may they (not with a faint hope, but in full reliance on God's recorded promise) avail themselves of the means which he has put into their power.

* See also Deut. xxx. 3.

III. And more special does this gift become, in proportion to the length of time which we have suffered to glide by without applying ourselves to the ordinary and offered means of obtaining it. As in every other case, so in that of change of mind,—the opportunities presented to us for effecting it, diminish to our perception, in number and importance, as we proceed further and further in slighting them. Thus a portion of them perishes to us daily, neither can any art or contrivance of man recall them. As well may the greybeard demand back from the grave the mates of former years, as endeavour to resuscitate these golden attendants upon his better days. He is left alone, abandoned both by one and the other; he has outlived them all. Our experience, both from without and from within, tells us that this miserable destitution must, in too many cases, occur. The most vigilant among us has to weep over opportunities neglected and irrevocable: what then has been the loss, how incalculable in price and amount, to the reckless; to those who, ever intent on the present hour, neither looked for warning wisdom to the past, nor for cautious foresight to the future; whose whole life was to-day,—to whom there was neither yesterday nor morrow; who lay like a dead body, fixed in one spot, passive to all accidents, unconscious of the past life, insensible to the life to come? But behold the overpowering mercy of God! Is health, after a long and desperate sickness; is prosperity, after a weary period of severe distress; is joy, after nights and days of deep and prolonged sorrow,—are these reckoned special gifts of God's intervention? What then shall we think of his raising the sinner's spirit, which has been long bowed down to the very dust of this carnal world? Is it not the miraculous raising of the crooked cripple; is it not a spiritual resurrection of the dead? Taken in every view, therefore, repentance, coming to a sinner, is a special and signal gift of God: it is a grace which we cannot, any more than any other, confer upon ourselves; and yet is so far from being placed beyond our reach, that we may rather say that it has been most anxiously intruded into it; while at the same time it argues the utmost infatuation of recklessness to neglect its opportunities, under the notion that we can recall them at will.

Having thus considered the call to repentance, let us proceed to discuss the work itself, beginning from the second stage of it, in which the heart, now partly weaned from the world, first addresses itself to God. Of the heart I have spoken, as being but partly weaned at this stage; and we should be much mistaken, and most grievously discouraged, did we imagine repentance to be of a day, and not of years. Its two elements, namely, the renunciation of the world, and the conversion to God, being both gradual, of course the whole is gradual likewise.

I. With regard to the first, let us only reflect how manifold and how intricate are the bonds of entanglement by which the world holds us captive. They are not only bonds of strong and wayward passion, links of iron and brass, obvious and palpable to the dullest sense; but they are also fine and silken, an intricate net-work, so subtle as to escape our unpurified eye: bonds formed by the gentlest affections, by the most amiable feelings, which sit so easy, so accommodate themselves to all our motions, that we imagine ourselves free. Here lies the pith of our resistance to the world; here is the crisis of our struggle. How many persons, for instance, who would maintain the dictates of their conscience most manfully against open force, yet have yielded them to gentle influence: how many, who would turn with abhorrence from a direct and open temptation to sin, have been drawn into it by indirect and covert invitation: how many, who blamed or pitied a neighbour whom they saw under its gross and open tyranny, have all the while been equally under its invisible power. To escape from such bonds, requires two qualities bestowed by God's grace, both of them of gradual growth; discernment, to see those secret ties, and resolution, to snap them asunder. These will grow stronger and stronger by exercise; and exercise they will have, to the end of life, until its last thread be broken.

II. With regard to the second, ask of those who have been long in the habit of keeping God before their minds; hear them confess how unsteady, after all their aspirations, is the hold of their sight upon him; how the due notion at which they would arrive, floats and flickers before them; in what perplexity they find themselves, when endeavouring to select it out and make it the leading idea, amid the less worthy and tumultuary crowd which is hurrying through their bosom; hear them acknowledge to what various and singular expedients they are often obliged to resort, in order to rouse their dull feelings, and express in their minds a due sense of his continual presence; an adequate apprehension of his awful attributes of majesty, power, holiness, and justice; or a proper estimate of his exceeding loving-kindness and mercy. If such be the case with those who are far advanced on their course of amendment, how must it be with him who confronts, as it were, his God for the first time? Brought from outer darkness into the intolerable blaze of the majesty of his presence, what can be his feeling, but that of overpowering fear, which, for the moment, sees no other attributes in God but inevitable ubiquity, inexorable justice? This, however, is the beginning of wisdom, and as, in God's moral economy, chastisement introduces happiness; so in his spiritual, horror and dismay usher in the sense of his gentle attributes of mercy, love, and forgiveness, which arrive, in the end, in company with hope. So then here is a progressive state from fear to love, the penitent casting out every day somewhat of the first, in proportion as he imbibes of the second. Penitence becomes thus gradually a more calm and staid quality, but at the same time, it deepens in feeling, for the growing purity of the bosom, arising from the grace of our communication with God, makes us daily more sensible to the iniquity of our former sins; the lightness of our yoke reminds us more strongly of our previous burden; our improving obedience sets in deeper, darker contrast our previous disobedience; our deepening consciousness of his mercy makes us more ashamed of having formerly slighted it; and our brightening notions of all his attributes, make us more and more astonished at our infatuated recklessness, which could so long have trifled with them. Thus fresh objects of repentance are daily rising to the view of the penitent, witnesses of the corruption of heart in which he has been so long sunk, which will continue prophesying to him in sackcloth and in ashes to the last. From them he receives a daily rebuke; from them turns, fully humbled, to supplicate the God of mercies, and the God of mercies each day turns his mourning into joy: the wounds which he now bears being no longer the effect of present sins, but the impression of the sorrowful memory of the past, are the marks which he bears, not of the world, but of Christ in him. From this fear and this love—these two co-relative sources of sorrow and joy—flow all the Christian's graces: from the one, his lowliness, meekness, and charity; from the other, his elevated feelings of hope, fortitude, and thankfulness; and these apparently opposing elements, chastising and curbing here, invigorating and enlarging there, perfect that frame of mind which results from a full and unfeigned repentance,—even from that repentance by which we are admitted to covenanted pardon and peace, in Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Consisting, as the process thus described must, of several steps, we need not be surprised if the penitent sometimes stops short in it. We have already seen that the first step of turning away from the world by no means necessarily leads to the next, which is the turning to God: even when the sinner intends to turn to God, he often mistakes for it his disgust of the world, and contenting himself with this evidence, proceeds no further, but rather in a short time becomes reconciled again to the former minister of his false happiness. And even if he have turned and caught a glimpse of his God, this very glimpse presents in the same moment so long and dark an interval of continued and laborious struggle to attain a full, clear light, that he shrinks from the toil; he wilfully deludes himself with the comfortable thought, that having once turned to God he is advancing: and, having admitted a ray of heavenly light into his bosom, he rests upon it as evidence of being in a state of peace with God, instead of proceeding with it as an earnest of more to be obtained. Even thus it too frequently happens that God's summons to repentance is misinterpreted by our self-delusion into an assurance that all is well. We regard it as a signal to go to quarters, and not to march. We look upon it as a certificate of being put into possession, not as a promise that we shall possess. It is to us the setting sun, which tells us that our work is done; not the rising, which tells us that our work must be begun. It is the rainbow, which we may stand and gaze at, and assure ourselves of God's covenant of safety; and not the cloudy pillar by day, and fiery pillar by night, which we must never cease to follow up.

Again: even after we have turned our face in good earnest (at least, as we think) to God, the distance at which he appears from us, and our consequent despondence, gives a temporary advantage to the world, which is nigh at hand with all its outward cheerfulness. We have now, therefore, for the first time, two masters openly set before us, each calling us to his service: for the first time we are fully aware of the difficulties which beset the road to eternal life: for the first time we become conscious of the exceeding power of the world. We thought not of the strength of its stream while we were carelessly floating with it; but now we have to make head against it, and with difficulty can we keep our footing. What wonder, then, if at this point often occurs a long pause, or even a retrograde step? Here is the crisis of the penitent's fate, but here, likewise, is the assisting grace of God most manifestly shown, strengthening amid weakness. But for this help our corrupt nature would immediately relapse into its former state, and we should deem the fleeting world, of which we are in occupation, at least an equivalent to the everlasting world, which is in expectance. From the whole process of repentance, thus considered, it is evident that we must address ourselves to it without delay; it is a work to which the more bodily and mental vigour we can bring on our part, the more certain are we of completing it through God's grace. But not only our limbs and senses are daily becoming less active and pliant, but our minds and thoughts also. Our will is daily losing somewhat of its sovereignty over both one department and the other; and when the trembling hand refuses to obey, the thoughts also will most probably be out of our controul. Thus there is a point where, humanly speaking, repentance is no longer possible. Now, therefore, when it is suggested, is the acceptable time. Now let the holy work begin; and God, that desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live, will save our souls alive.

DISSERTATION X.

ON THE STATE OF A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH OF GOD.

Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness.—Rom. iv. 3.

IN the moment of the first man's sin, his relation to God was changed. He had disobeyed the will of God, conformity to which constituted the excellence of his nature, and was the only principle of harmony to its various qualities. His original nature was now, like a dead body, in a state of hideous dissolution, from the loss of the vital principle; and discordant passions, unrestrained appetites, broken thoughts, took place of that compact system, in which every part bore without a single deviation to the one grand object. His passions, instead of being excited by the love of God, were now roused by the love of himself; his appetites, instead of finding satisfaction in God's provision for them, sought it any where else, and therefore in earthly things rather than heavenly; his thoughts, instead of centering in the worship and contemplation of God, were scattered abroad, and having lost that converging impulse by which they ascended straight to the throne of heaven, lay, like a fog, entangled amid the briers and brambles of earth. If, therefore, in his former state, he was an object of God's love, what else could he be in his present, but an object of his wrath and condemnation? Nevertheless, such is God's unspeakable mercy, he was met in this miserable state by a promise of restoration. And the effect of that promise on this state, now, alas! the natural state of man, is the object of the present inquiry. It is essential to the nature of a promise, that it can have no retrospect: however suggested by past circumstances, it cannot take them into its conditions. Hence the promise of everlasting life, being proposed by God to man, he is freed from all anxiety regarding his conduct previous to his acceptance of it. The very promise annuls the past, as far as responsibility can be concerned, and assures him that it is irrelative to the great bliss to be conveyed to him. Such a promise is therefore necessarily accompanied with an assurance of the forgiveness of past sins. The acceptance of the promise on the part of man, is through faith in God the giver; this being essential on the part of the receiver, in any promise between any parties. This promise also is made by God for the sake of the merits of Jesus Christ, his only son. From these several considerations being put together, there arises the proposition, that our sins are forgiven through faith, for the sake of the merits of Jesus Christ; in other words, we are justified through faith, on account of the merits of Jesus Christ.

And this proposition, having been deduced from principles common to every stage of God's Church, is applicable to every period of it; the only difference will be, that the reason of God's forgiveness is not necessary to be revealed to all men, and therefore its complete development was reserved for that period which he had destined for the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began. (Rom. xvi. 25.)

The forgiveness of sins thus conveyed to the natural man on his accepting God's promise in faith, is called justification, his injustice up to that moment not being taken into account.

We have now to examine the nature of this faith.

It is a lively and implicit belief in God's promise, nor can man, from the very nature of the case, bring any thing more wherewith to meet God: works, we have seen, are entirely excluded. What, indeed, could the lost, the degraded, the despairing Adam bring, but an humble and earnest acceptance of whatever God in his mercy should think fit to bestow? What could be the recommendation of Abraham before God, more than a sincere conviction of the truth of his promises, even against all human grounds of hope? and what can the receiver of the Gospel plead but his faith in God through Christ? Works taken into account at this moment, would throw man back again into his condemnation. We are justified, therefore, by faith alone, without works, and the faith of man and the forgiveness of God are correlative terms; and thus, for instance, the Gospel of Christ proclaims remission of sins to all men, of whatever condition, mental, moral, or physical,—to the philosopher and to the ignorant, to the publican and the pharisee, to the man in the king's court, to the beggar on the highway,—to him who hath worked from dawn, and to him who began but at the eleventh hour, provided they will only repent and believe. All, therefore, whatever they may have been before,—by whatever ways, and through whatever length of time they may have arrived at it,—are in this moment held to be equal,—there is no difference between master and slave, Jew and Greek. But however long God's preventing grace may have been predisposing the heart to entertain this justifying faith, it is evident that the act of justification is momentary: it is a single point in our life, on one side of which all the past is cancelled, on the other all is future in bright and brilliant hope. It is a moment, as it were, of spiritual re-animation; and as when God recalls from death, he by that very act also necessarily infuses a principle of life, so in this act he not only acquits us from sin, but also infuses a vivifying spirit of holiness. From this circumstance, and also because it is due to the operation of the Holy Ghost, the state ensuing from this moment is called the state of sanctification, and must extend henceforward to our life's end.

Now, since the moment after justification, our previous nature, with its thoughts and feelings, still subsists, the relation in which God chooses to consider us, alone having undergone an effective change as yet, and as the Holy Spirit has commenced his operations, and as faith (which waits in hope the accomplishment of the thing promised, but unseen) must still subsist and proceed, we see that not only faith, but works also, must be taken into account in our consideration of this state.

And first, with regard to faith.

Every one knows by experience, that the more objects we can lay hold of, and bring together, as it were, to converge to the desired end, the firmer our assurance in its accomplishment becomes: hence, our faith is capable of growth in extent and stability. And, indeed, since an active mind is always progressive to some point, if our faith did not grow correspondingly, it would soon be overlaid and choaked up by the growth of other faculties and feelings: but the objects thus supplied to the exercise of the faith of the religious man daily grow in number and importance. He has God's holy word, and God's holy spirit, to supply them. The latter enlightens his understanding to the study of the former, which, having been also the production of the same spirit, brings him into still closer communion with the giver of light, whose co-operation is still further obtained in meditation and prayer; hence the faith of this man is every day seeing fresh objects to lead him on to the end unseen. He is taking a more and more comprehensive view of the holy word; he is constantly bringing more and more points together to bear to that end, which before seemed unconnected; he is gradually supplying to every communication with the world, a firm base in God's revelation, on which it shall rest like a rock amid the waves, unmoved by wind or tide of human affairs; he is daily providing some new heavenly principle, some new deduction of faith, to support him against trial and temptation; every day he opens his eyes upon more on which to be humbled, more on which to be thankful, more on which to love, more on which to praise, to sing, and to be joyful. Thus our faith, growing with the number of objects which give it exercise, daily gathering under its dominion more and more of the subjects of thought and passion, advances continually towards that comprehension which shall include all our reflection and practice, and that stability which nothing of this world can shake. It is attaining a protecting omnipresence, as it were, in all the goings forth of our spirit, whether its objects be within or without. While human faculties, such as human knowledge, widen at the expense of depth, this heavenly faculty is given without stint or measure.

This progressive quality of faith is several times mentioned or implied by Scripture. In its least degree it is likened to a grain of mustard-seed (Luke xvii. 6); but this, though the least of seeds, grows to the greatest tree. Men may be established and grounded in the faith, and may be moved away (Col. i. 23), and faith is the victory which overcometh the world (1 John v. 4).

We may briefly show the vast extent allowed to the progress of faith, by instancing the difference between a justifying and a sanctifying faith. The one is the result of a comparison of the gifts of the world with God's promise, and ends in the joyful election of the latter. But the other has entirely dismissed the former from all consideration, and fixes entirely upon the latter. In the one, was an assured expectation of help from God; in the other, is the conscious enjoyment of it, acting as an earnest of more and greater. There, the beginning is in fear; here, the end is in love. There, the seed was sown; here, the fruit is gathered. The number of objects supplied to the nourishment of faith must have grown more numerous as the church grew in age, which, in this instance, resembles one of its members, whose case we have been considering. The faith of Adam, and his patriarchal successors, must have had its objects, few, and all prospective; nothing, as far as is recorded, having been added to the original promise, which could bring it nearer to the eye, or increase its clearness, until the call of Abraham. If we take the Jewish church at its brightest period, we find that its members had presented to their eyes a bright track, allowing the eye to rest at intervals on brilliant and glorious objects, and yet conducting it on, through an undeviating line, to the accomplishment of the original and general prophecy. The Jew stood here at a point of time up to which, from the delivery of the prophecy, stretched a series of heart-stirring wonders and mercies, shown to his nation; and onward from which stretched another series, glittering through the darkness of futurity. At the same time, the voice of living prophets was sounding in his ear, and adding star after star, cluster upon cluster, until he gazed upon a milky way, as it were, of coming events. But how insignificant is even all this, compared with what is presented to the eye of Christian faith. It is, indeed, the starry night which ushers us in a bright and glorious day. For all which was brilliant vision to the Jew, is to us a body of glorious and substantial facts; our future begins where his ended, and is limited but by the consummation of all things, when our mighty Lord and Saviour shall come again in glory to judge both the quick and the dead. Besides our own peculiar view, we have all which the Patriarch saw in hope, and the Jew in prophecy. It may, perhaps, be objected, that our advantage is not so very great here, inasmuch as our belief is more easily given to a few well-established facts, than to a multitude; that, at all events, a few are sufficient, being as much as the mind can command in its grasp. This would be true, were not the connexion between the facts so close, the tendency of all to one point so clear, that, a single term accepted, all the rest follow of course; and then the accumulation pressing upon the mind in every direction, leaves not a single heaving point; not a single expression of murmuring doubt can escape. Belief will readily admit intervals of other impressions on the mind, and may therefore come from a few facts; but faith is, as it were, an omnipresence of conviction, flowing from every quarter to which we turn, and for this continual impression requires a continual supply of objects.

To illustrate what we have been saying, let us take up an individual instance; let us consider the progress in faith made by the Christian convert. At the very outset, his faith, by keeping his eye fixed upon his Saviour, would now enable him, for the first time, to overcome some besetting temptation; for the first time to subdue some tyrannous passion, which had destroyed his peace of conscience. He has here a cheering proof of the efficacy of faith, and his faith is increased; and as he advances from conquest to conquest over the flesh, he also grows from faith to faith. Thus is it with regard to his practice. At the same time, on his applying in his newly-acquired faith to God's holy word, he would there, for the first time, find something wonderfully corresponding to some particular state of his mind, both vividly suggesting it, and most happily directing it; whether it be some uneasiness which he now finds turned into comfort, or some enjoyment which he now finds exalted and sanctified into lasting spiritual happiness. And thus while, on every successive reading, he brings different states of mind to it, and receives for each an all-sufficient remedy, or sanctifying direction, his faith grows stronger daily, until the word of God is so inwoven into all his thoughts, is so diffused into the whole frame of his mind, as to be the ruling principle, and not the mere accessory. Thus internally also he grows from faith to faith. Again, every day that he turns over the pages of Scripture, some fact detailed in it strikes him as it never did before; and objects are daily arising to nourish his growing faith in his hours of meditation. And thus, at length, he attains unto that faith, which is proof to the seductions of the flesh, to the perplexities of the spirit; which, in a word, overcometh the world.

Having ascertained the nature of faith, let us next inquire into its rank and value. It is the fountain-head of every other holy acquirement. Faith in the love of Christ moves our love towards each other. Faith in the help of Christ, and in the life to come, which he bestows, gives us patience to bear, and courage to dare. Faith, holding up our own unworthiness, and his all-sufficient merits, inspires us with gentleness and meekness. Just as a powerful well-head supplies a number of pools below, which serve for heads of water for irrigation, so does faith supply the forementioned qualities, which give life and vigour to our Christian practice.

It is in constant activity, ever welling forth, and bubbling up, and by a constant supply keeping the pools full against the proper season of their being called upon to perform their part. Possession, therefore, of this can alone give us possession of the rest. On this account it is that sometimes Holy Scripture sums up the whole Gospel under this single term of faith. If all our other Christian qualities are thus dependant upon faith, much more are works, which are the outward expression of those qualities. Faith, therefore, is the main-trunk, these qualities are the branches, works are the fruit. Faith is essential to the very existence of the tree; works are necessary to its value, but accidental to its existence.

But, at the same time, it is with very good reason that the authors of the epistles of the New Testament direct their exhortations not to faith, but rather to works; with provocations to these they overflow. For faith, being the inward principle of exercise to the spirit, as life is of motion to the body, can only be maintained by that exercise. A physician would not say to the sick man, maintain your life, increase your vital powers; but would insist upon using exercise, practising diet. If a body show neither motion nor speech, it is dead to all purposes of this world; and so faith without works is dead to all purposes of the spiritual world. But though the supremacy of faith be thus undoubted, such disputes have taken place upon the relative value of works, that the subject cannot be so immediately dismissed, especially as the result is of the utmost importance. It is astonishing what continual mistakes and misunderstandings in moral questions arise from inattention to the definite sense of words. While every one is eager in the use of general terms, scarcely any one is patient enough to ascertain their full meaning. We have a strong instance of this in the use of the term "good works." How many have defined to themselves their acceptation of the word "good" here?

Good works may be so termed in two ways. First, they may be called good, because they have resulted from the natural principle of right reason, recognized by us individually and socially; in this sense they are good according to the moral philosopher. But in a second sense they are good, as proceeding from a conscience informed by God's revealed will. In this sense only are they good, according to the theologian; for it is clear that the Christian who works upon the first principle, who is dutiful, affectionate, charitable, merely from natural motives, so far from obeying God, is disobeying him. God tells him to act from this motive, and he chooses to act from that. The confusion of these two different principles of action is the rock upon which heedless and mere professing Christians are perpetually striking. They imagine themselves to have performed God's will, when they have not taken the trouble to learn it; to have pleased him, when they have but pleased themselves; and mistake the applause of man for the approval of God.

But among those who understand the term in its proper sense, there are unfortunate disputes as to what title we should give them in expressing their relation to our spiritual condition. The only opinions which need be canvassed here are two; namely, that which entitles their exhibition a condition of salvation, and that which calls them the fruits and evidences of a true and lively faith. Between the well-informed propounders of these opinions, the difference appears to be rather nominal than real. But not so among their less considerate followers; they are led more by words than things. It becomes us, therefore, to make our election between these two modes of expression. The first appears deficient in logical precision upon so critical a doctrine; for it includes in its terms two propositions, which, while it is most necessary to distinguish them from each other, thus come confounded to the understanding of the unexploring reader. It tells us, not only that if we have not works we shall not be saved, but also, that if we have works we shall be saved; and in this latter sense, which commends itself so much to our self-sufficiency, it is very generally accepted by the careless and unreflecting; to them it expresses little, if anything, less than the doctrine of merits. But neither, if we confine the expression to the first of these included propositions, will it give a clear statement of the fact; for it confounds the sense of the word condition. The condition of salvation is purely conventional, being the merits of Christ on the part of God, faith on the part of man. But here the condition is necessary, and moreover subordinate to the other, since the expression, when fully explained, must be intended to say that, if we are to be saved, we must have faith, (where the condition is one of convention:) and that if we have faith it must produce works, (where the condition is a moral necessity.) In whichever way, therefore, we resolve the general proposition of the exhibition of works being a condition of salvation, there is ground for misapprehension, and its employers cannot complain of misrepresentation. The second mode of expression, therefore, seems preferable; and both boasting and despondency, which may arise from differently misunderstanding the first, are excluded. Boasting cannot have place, because the man, whose lively faith is the author of the work, has in his contemplation such attributes of perfection, even of the Father, whom he sees in his son Jesus Christ who hath declared him,—such justice, such holiness; and turns from these to find in his own best frame of mind such an humiliating contrast; is so continually rebuked by the comparison of what he has done with what he should have done; descries such a wide interval even between the will and the deed, imperfect as the former is, and again between the means given to him, and the end produced by him, that he will indeed confess with all confusion of face that he is an unprofitable servant. But despondency will be excluded, not only because his lively faith has a lively apprehension of God's mercy, but also because his works, embodying though they do much sad fleshly superfluity together with his principles of faith, will be evidences to him of the abiding of God's grace in his heart; and although they bear no proportion to the model which he has in view, no more than finite to infinite, yet they admit of degrees among each other; and if the progress towards perfection be indiscernible as ever, yet the remoteness from helpless human corruption begins to be visible. His tree at all events is bearing fruit; it is in the heavenly vineyard, is is tended by the heavenly vine-dresser, and the earnest which it has given of answering his care will earn still more of his attention; grace will be given for grace; the very discovery of his deficiencies will administer comfort in the same moment that they abash him: for when a man has found out where he is weak, he has also found out where he may hereafter be less weak; and from the corruption of man he is enabled to estimate more distinctly, by contrast, the power of the amending grace of God; and hence he feels assured that sufficient shall be supplied to his overcoming the world.

Good works, therefore, are the fruits of a lively faith, and are acceptable to God, as the fruit of the tree to the Father, which has been planted by the husbandry of his only begotten Son. Holy he accounts the vineyard, holy the tree, and holy the fruit; if it continue to bear fruit, the care of the husbandman is both continued and increased. If it bear not fruit, it is cut down, cast out of the vineyard, and burned. But as the ploughman who looks back is not fit for the kingdom of heaven, so neither must we be casting fond retrospects upon our works, and thus resting in them with all complacency: we must be ever looking forward, and what has been done must be but a call to do more; grace supplied must lead to grace to be supplied. Hence a diligent examination of our state is necessary, and here it is that our good works tell practically as evidences to us of our state towards salvation. This will appear from an examination for the proper tests of our faith. They are from within and from without.

I. The testimony from within is peace of mind, being borne by our conscience, and in three different ways.

First: It will come from the understanding; and this, when well examined, gives the surest evidence of all, because it is that part of us, which from its remote and abstract nature, is least likely to be imposed upon by the outward world, and its passions. The force of this testimony will consist in the absence of all doubt and perplexity, in the entertainment of clear and consistent views, in quick discernment of consequences, in most full and reasonable conviction of the principles of belief, which it has attained by long and patient investigation, and in a mastery over its sacred subjects, so as to be ever ready to produce and apply them as the practice of life shall demand them. No man can have confidence in the steadiness of his faith, without the answer of some such touchstone as this.

Secondly: It will consist in purity and propriety of imagination, by which I mean not only the presence of nothing but pure images in the mind, but also proper and adequate, and abiding. Is our notion of God sufficiently exalted; is our view of the gospel, with all its facts, consistent with Scripture? Is the character of Christ written in all its true holiness and loveliness on our breast? Are the mighty events by which he wrought our redemption, pictured there in true, lively, and abiding characters; cheering us, and prompting us as models by which to shape our own conduct? Do these holy pictures, drawn after long study of their heavenly prototypes, touch after touch, by perusal after perusal of Scripture, still grow day after day into greater likeness and harmony with the originals, which day after day we turn over? Do we hail them with increasing delight, and patiently proceed comparing, improving, amending, until the glorious whole be formed in us? In proportion as we have repelled all impure, low, trivial, and earthly imaginations, and possessed ourselves with pure, lofty, serious, and heavenly, we have acquired a saving faith, and are enjoying the beneficial cooperation of the Holy Spirit.

Thirdly: It will come from our passions and feelings, and will consist in the absence of all vexation; in the consciousness of daily gaining some victory over them; in the resignation of all our desires into God's hands; in the looking on the world with the calmness of one who sees in each event, however it may affect him, even to extreme poverty and affliction, one harbinger more of the coming of the kingdom of Christ; to whom and to whose cause he has surrendered himself in every wish and appetite, and can cry out, joyful amid sorrow, like a zealous imitator of the obedience of his Saviour, "Not my will, O Lord, but thy will be done." In proportion as we thus can overcome the world, and establish the kingdom of heaven over our hearts, will be the value of the testimony arising from this source. Before, however, proceeding to the next class, we must observe, that not very many men are possessed of sufficient reflection, and of such steady attention to the working of their own minds, as to draw much advantage from the above sources. Only the higher and most carefully disciplined minds can apply to them. The rest will, except under very pressing circumstances which concentrate their attention on some particular occasion, cast a look so superficial, that they will not be aware (at least from these means) how vanity is deluding their understanding, enthusiasm abusing their imagination, and interest working upon their passions. To these, therefore, that is, to the great generality of mankind, a surer test is afforded from sources of the next class. Happy indeed is he who can make good use of both!

II. The value of the testimony, from without, that is, of works, arises from their being a palpable expression of our frame of mind, the final result of the thoughts and passions which we have been cherishing there. And it tells us of two things: first, whether we be really possessed of certain inward qualities, for which we give ourselves credit; and, secondly, brings to light qualities which we had not suspected in ourselves.

On the first point we may remark how prone we are to give ourselves credit for certain gifts of nature; for calmness of mind, contentedness of spirit, evenness of temper. But it is plain that unless we can exhibit to our conscience outward proofs of these being put into exercise, not by the dictates of nature, but by the motive of faith, they are of no account, but rather the contrary: we have received talents which we have never sought to improve, and turn to the service of our Master. From faith alone can we receive the energy to overcome the lets and hindrances, with which all natural gifts are, as with means of proof and trial, accompanied. With the above-mentioned gifts are generally found also reluctance to exertion, passiveness to the authority and advice of others, fear of contradiction. So also fortitude of mind is often joined with an unevangelical stubbornness; cautiousness of belief, with scepticism; curiosity of inquiring, with barren and minute trifling. Faith alone will free the gift from its countervailing partner, and bring it unfettered and energetic into action; and so brought, it will give us a testimony of the spirit abiding within us.

On the second point we need not observe how ignorant men are of themselves, not only through passion and interest, not only through inattention, but also from incapacity of passing judgment upon their inward thoughts. Such a mingled mass is the mind of almost every man, consisting of thoughts and passions of manifold complexions, of manifold stages from mere confused elements to ripe matured notions, that they seldom know its general bearing before it gives birth to some work. Then, indeed, the deformity which escaped them in the dark depths of their bosom is seen clearly in the light before men. Then the laws and the customs of the world, and the word of Scripture, immediately bring it to their bar, and the whole man is judged from this single fact. His works then tried in the conscience of the believer, will give him an evidence, which otherwise he could not obtain, of the spirit within him. The approval or condemnation of the world will only operate to his examining it with greater and more scrupulous jealousy by the test of God's word; and according as it is agreeable to that test he may reckon his sincerity of faith.

Such are the testimonies from within and from without, which the Christian has of his spiritual state, and to these he must be daily appealing: they mark distinctly out the way which he is going, and he can see whether it tend to the only proper end or not. The proof of the accuracy of his examination will be the accordance of the testimony from within and from without, in both cases subjected to the word of God, that searcher of the heart. If both agree in telling him that he is advancing in grace, most happy he, and the effusion of the spirit upon his heart will give him still further assurance and faith in God, and his Son Jesus Christ, even as the dew on the fleece of wool did to Gideon of old (Judges vii. 37). And finally he will obtain that faith which overcometh the world, and enjoy its crowning triumph, which is, to have transferred himself in hope and affections above: and as in the body he puts full faith in the permanency of the operations of Providence; pursues his plans on the full assurance of the sun rising on the morrow, of the sea maintaining its level, of the earth yielding its increase; even so, even with the same certainty, to work in spirit, convinced that the grace of God shall never fail, that the help of his knowledge shall ever abide, that the bliss and glory of the life to come shall keep the appointed day, when the Son of Man shall come again in his glorious majesty to judge the quick and the dead.

DISSERTATION XI.

ON THE ANALOGY OF THE NATURAL AND SPIRITUAL BIRTH.

Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever.—1 Peter i. 23.

To be born again of God and of the Spirit, to be begotten by the word and through the gospel, to put off the old man and put on the new, to become as little children, to grow in grace and knowledge of the Lord, to come unto the perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ,—these are phrases which are continually meeting our eyes in the pages of Holy Scripture; and it were well if their pregnant meaning as often found its way to our hearts. They are indeed figurative; but it is only by means of illustration, drawn from the world of flesh, that our imperfect nature can obtain a glimpse of the objects and operations of the world of spirit; and they convey to us as clearly as our duties and condition here can require, the important fact, that we have to undergo a moral death, the death unto sin,—and a moral birth, the birth unto righteousness; and that there is a strong analogy between the birth and growth of the body and that of the spirit, so that we may learn from the one to ascertain, with sufficient precision, the progressive stages of the other.

As this analogy (which it is now purposed to pursue) is intelligible only so far as our consciousness carries us, it will be sufficient to commence it from that moment, when God, by some one among his many merciful interventions with sinful man, calls him from a state of worldly thoughtlessness to a serious consideration of his spiritual condition; and from a secure and almost unconscious enjoyment of mere initiatory spiritual privileges, to their actual and full exercise. That moment is, perhaps, with some, but too transitory, and the creature dies almost in the birth; others expire in the rudiments of childhood; some, alas! in the prime of manhood; some, after a long struggle with infirmity, start into health, and illustrate the analogy to its full extent, and to their own salvation, and the glory of their master.

Let us take the natural world, and contemplate the young child. Observe his intense curiosity, his unwearied, minute, and detailed examination of the new world around him. He will not be satisfied with the distant evidence of sight, hereafter to be his principal guide; but he must touch, taste, handle, and thus is forming that correctness of vision, whereby he may in future judge of what lies beyond his reach. Such is the new man, upon his first introduction into the spiritual world. Besides what is peculiar to it, all that detail which before surrounded him, but scarcely could engage his attention, now, invested with a new character, solicits his observation, at every moment, from every quarter. All that train of consequences which flow so abundantly from the sinfulness of man, from the mercy, love, and justice of God, from a crucified Redeemer, and the certainty of everlasting life,—all that is delivered line by line, and page by page, in God's holy word,—all the hourly duties of life, which are now become the palpable dress of spiritual meditation and feelings,—all the opportunities which his clear sight now perceives thrusting themselves upon his notice, coming from God, like his daily bread, to try and nourish his young faculties,—all these fill his sphere of thought and action to overflow, attract him by their novelty, invite him by their grandeur to examine, and compare, and spiritually handle. His ardent curiosity will let nothing pass before him, merely as an object of sight; he must take in hand and prove all things, and cleave to that which is good. Thus he acquires those just powers of spiritual vision by which he extends his sphere of knowledge, that he may be enabled to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, and be filled with all the fulness of God.

The child, moreover, even while apparently least engaged, is nevertheless by various unseen ways acquiring the necessary experience in the world around him; his habits are forming, he is growing conscious of his faculties of body and mind, more sensible to the calls of his new existence. And so, too, the infant of the spiritual world, in his intervals of practical quietude, is still busy; his newly-formed thoughts are arranging themselves, his mind is ascertaining its place and relation in the new world, he is almost unconsciously analyzing and combining the precious materials which he has gathered, so that on his return to more active communication, it is with augmented powers, and with more intense enjoyment. The child's communication with the sensible world presents him immediately with one set of instincts, and mediately, through gradual experience, with another; and thus he proceeds from the use of his mother's breast, of his own limbs, organs, and appetites, to those multifarious habits, those instantaneous though acquired operations, bodily, intellectual, and moral, which unconsciously are exhibited by a settled system of body and mind. Exactly analogous is the process and result upon our introduction to the spiritual world; and as in the former case we were under the influence of that continued exertion of God's power to which we owed our birth, and which we call nature, so in this we are under the continued grace of the Holy Spirit, by which we were born; and the world to which he has brought us operating upon our minds, produces a class of appropriate spiritual instincts,—partly directly, from the very act of our intercourse, partly indirectly, in the process of habitual reflection and continual experience,—the results remaining by us in the shape of first principles, though the process by which we arrived at them may have been long dismissed from memory. To the former class, for example, belongs the fear of God, and a sense of our own unworthiness, the immediate and inevitable results of our first communication with the spiritual world. Among such as the course of time supplies, may be placed instantaneous resistance to temptation: for it is only by a series of mortifying experiments that we can learn to distinguish its most dangerous aspects, espy its most formidable points of attack, estimate the ruinous consequences of a momentary relaxation of our guard; and thus arrive at the desirable result of an instant and intuitive view of the peril, and of as instant repulsion.

As in the case of the child, these principles increase in strength and number as we proceed, daily embracing a wider range of our actions, and guarding us more and more effectually from those unforeseen accidents, forestalling all calculation, to which our course is liable; fresh acquirements being daily made, others obtained long ago are daily settling down into the class of first principles. And thus, as in the sensible world, our immediate healthy communication with the spiritual world being secured, the higher faculties, released from the slavish duty of the mere preservation of this new existence, are at liberty to extend their range of discovery through the realms of spirit day after day, refining our nature, and raising us from a precarious and bare subsistence to a more exalted state of being. There is, therefore, a childhood, a youth, and a manhood. In the first state, the new man is learning the use of his limbs and senses. He is, therefore, in continual apprehension. As he endeavours to keep the way of God, he is liable to swerve or to stumble; as he puts forth his hand to lay hold of God's promises, his aim is uncertain, his grasp is weak. As he gazes around him he is alarmed by unwonted sights; in the old man he had never imagined that such infirmity would be his lot; he had imagined that he had only to go on and prosper, whenever he should seriously address himself to newness of life. He clings, therefore, anxiously to his divine teacher, and confidence in his ready help, joined with the growing sense of power, gradually frees him from the slavery of his fears. With youth, his fear of falling is exchanged for a determination to run for the prize; his aim is sure; and as his previous state required an anxious shunning of unholiness, his present includes also the joyful pressing on after holiness. Still, however, his different powers have not been equally put forth: some are too forward, others too backward. There is a quickness of mental sight to catch the golden opportunities of God's grace, to discern the workings of the Spirit, to discover on each occasion the will of his master; there is confidence in his means, strength in his arm, and resolution for the struggle which he has to maintain. But the unwinking steadiness of observation, which faces the evil as boldly as it hails the good; the patience which is unwearied by slow and lingering trial; the caution which, gained from previous defeat, will beware of a second temptation, however disguised under a new aspect; the pertinacity of hold which will not forego an occasion of grace until he has extracted all its preciousness from it,—these belong to the grown man, whose various powers being fully ripened, have found their proper balance. And where is old age? It is not here. The new man, the restored inhabitant of Paradise, is immortal; and all his sojourn on earth is employed in attaining to a manhood, which can never be perfected in the mortal body, nor shall ever cease in the immortal.

The right use and diligent exercise of these faculties, acquired under our education by the Holy Spirit, is as necessary to our spiritual health as those of the body, under the continual influence of its peculiar Creator, are to its vigour and perfection; misemployment or neglect not only prevent progress, but also cause them to recede; derangement ensues, and disease, day after day, closes up some organ of communication with the world of spirit, till at last an exclusion, a spiritual death, ensues. Meanwhile, their proper use and improvement is attended with pleasurable feelings analogous to those which accompany a healthy growth of the body; and as the youth hails with delight the increasing supplies of stature and strength, which, by God's bounty, are flowing in so fast upon him, so the born of the Spirit enjoys the consciousness of continually increasing strength of spiritual grace, the development of one faculty, the ripening of another, by which he is enabled to soar still higher above mere earthly existence, and arrive at a closer communication with the Father of Spirits.

No analogy, however, can be perfect: sooner or later the parallel must fail. In the case now before us, we must remember that, while we are perfect denizens of the sensible world, we are at the same time but imperfectly admitted to the spiritual. In some points, therefore, this analogy of flesh and spirit can be but fairly traced, in others will fail altogether. For instance; in the former, so powerful are our instincts, that no perversion of our reasoning faculties (and this has been attempted) can resist or overcome them: but in the latter, owing to our imperfect tenure of it, their resistance may be surmounted by wily argument, and the consequence is more dreadful in the proportion of a spiritual to a corporeal death. Therefore they must be guarded and obeyed with all diligence: they are as necessary to our spiritual welfare, as the belief of first principles is to that of the mind,—as the continuance of its various involuntary motions to that of the body. Let the Christian, therefore, beware how he argues against an instinctive reluctance of spirit. Let him contentedly abide the charge of obstinacy, because he cannot assign his reasons for it; and demand, in return, of the man of argument, why he turns away from a precipice, avoids a raging torrent, shuns a devouring fire. We may be assured that whenever reasoning is employed to stifle this internal protest, whether from ourselves or from others, it is supplied by the father of lies: is a net laid for our feet by the unwearied craft of the enemy of our salvation, who would willingly quench the life-giving spirit within us, and reduce us once more to the mortal bondage of the flesh.

Again, our spiritual creation is not independent, like that of our body, of any previous existence. It presupposes all along the ruder elements of our moral nature; and before we can acquire new principles peculiar to the spiritual world, such as maintain our intercourse with the sensible must have been moulded anew, received a different bias, taken another channel.

We have not only to learn, but to unlearn, and one of the most delightful feelings with which God rewards our spiritual improvement, is the discovery at length of a task which can satisfy our noblest faculties,—one in which alone we find them to act in perfect unison with concentrated effect, and this our complicated mental frame, to show forth all the harmony designed by the hand of its Creator. It is a feeling analogous to that of manhood, when it finds the proper direction and combined effect of those powers which had been lavished separately, and without object, on the trifles of childhood. For example:—the Christian who had formerly found, as he thought, his powers of understanding so vigorous, so acute, so suitably employed in the questions of policy, literature, or science, discovers now that they were coarse, blunt, inadequate, and unsuitably employed, compared with those to which, in the service of the spirit, they have now ripened, when his judgment has grown up to that intuitive and exquisite discernment of God's will, that nice selection, amid the daily mass of occasions placed before him, of what shall contribute best to his own spiritual health, and most redound to the honour and glory of his Saviour; setting apart, with unhesitating distinction, profitable from unprofitable, holy from unholy, lasting from fleeting, what is of God from what is of man; when his power of abstraction is spent no longer on unpractical dreams, but grasps real spiritual essences; when his foresight pushes far beyond the boundaries of life; and when his power of attention has become an absorption, by which he can shake off at will the distracting intrusion of the world.

Meanwhile, the power of imagination, that fruitful source of virtue and crime, of joy and sorrow, controlled now in its course by those improved powers, fastens upon what is pure, turns away from what is impure. It draws out before him, in visible series, God's mercies and dealings with mankind; it brings home to his heart all that is detailed in Holy Scripture, of his suffering and triumphant Saviour; embodies his holy attributes, renders sensible his presence, and continually holds up to his mind that which it is his prime object to realize, the model of the Christian character; depicturing all his graces and acquirements, suggesting his pure and unworldly sentiments, his towering thoughts, his unceasing homage to God, unwearied charity to man, his meekness, patience, hope, fortitude, and presenting his crown of everlasting glory, and the peace of the world to come.

Similar, too, is the improvement of his affections, which being, in the first instance, generated and nurtured by healthy exercise upon their proper objects on earth, and thence lifted up to God, their final object, in whom alone they find their craving satisfied, and object permanent, return upon the objects of daily duty, endued with a constancy superior to all caprice of chance or change, founded upon a new and unfailing basis. The Christian loves, for Christ loved him; forgives, for through Christ he was forgiven; is humble, for he is a fellow in sin; is charitable, for he is a brother in redemption; is patient, for he is an heir of salvation. Even the commonest gifts and qualities grow up into estimable Christian graces; passive good nature is exalted into active charity, sanguine temper into lively hope, flow of spirits into angelic cheerfulness, diffidence into humility, a quiet spirit into fortitude, contentment into devotion.

Thus, from his communion with the spiritual world, the Christian comes as from the presence of God, with his faculties refined and affections purified, carrying into the world of flesh around him, like Moses from the mountain, traces of the high communion in which he has been engaged. But his illumination is not of the face, but of the mind; not to be done away, but introductory to greater.

Such are a few of the coincidences which may be brought forward to illustrate the analogy of the growth of body and spirit, the Holy Ghost supplying a continual inspiration of life to its creature, just as the Creator supplies the breath of his nostrils to the man. It is difficult perhaps to pursue such an analogy far, without inadvertently falling into the error of describing spiritual operations as too much allied to corporeal; and much caution is required in drawing deductions from metaphorical illustrations, where the line of correct doctrine can be kept only by incessant reference to other considerations, which haste, or the natural fondness of pushing an analogy, is too apt to overlook. None, however, will dispute the conclusion, that spiritual amendment must be a work of time. Its commencement, indeed, must, like our birth into the sensible world, be momentary, whether it be referred to our entrance by baptism into the Church of the Christ and God, or to the first awakening impression of spiritual things upon the worldly-minded heart. But we may as well expect the perfect man to issue from his mother's womb, as conceive the Christian to be completely formed in the instant of his first turning his heart from the world to God. Were we to proceed with the analogy, we should conclude, inasmuch as the nobler creature is longer in arriving at maturity, and as the creature thus born admits neither of old age nor of death, that the spiritual man was longer in forming than the natural. Not, however, to insist upon this, it must be borne in mind that there is a long process to be undergone before a positive growth in spirit can be said to commence: previous affections must be weaned, passions subdued, faculties diverted from a wrong channel. And, moreover, let it be remembered, that the full measure of the gifts of the Holy Spirit is not poured upon the mind at once: it is distributed by successive portions, increasing in proportion to what is already maintained and turned to its proper account there. For, as our Lord himself says, "To him that hath shall much be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away, even what he hath."

Great, therefore, on every consideration, is the danger of procrastination, and even to speak of the past in the solemn phrase of lost moments never to be recovered, is to express but half of the melancholy truth. For every one of these moments, however swift of foot, or light of burden, has left its impression for good or for evil upon the mind, according to its state, clean or unclean; just as the same outward impressions which bring health to healthy organs, but aggravate the disease of the unhealthy. There is no middle point: if we go not forward, we go backward; if we be not standing, we are falling; if we be not in health, we are in decay. Do we delay on the idea of being able to commence the work of religious amendment, and start into newness of life, at will? Every consideration is opposed to an idea confessedly so absurd, and yet so commonly acted upon. It is indeed a strong proof of our delusion, that, with the analogy of the body before our eyes, and that body, too, often suffering for the sins of the mind, we should think to resume our moral health at pleasure: that while months, and even years, of painful and cautious regimen, are often necessary to re-establish the one, a few hurried days are at all times sufficient for the restoration of the other. That wound, and bruise, and putrifying sore, which for the best part of life have been cankering and eating into the mind, shall cease at once their horrid repast, upon the bare expression of our wish for health, and sorrow for their origin.

The human mind, however inattentive we may be to its operations, is all along growing up towards a certain system: feelings are becoming rooted, thoughts are interlacing one with another, according to some predominant principle, which at last, assuming sovereign sway, excludes all such as will not bend to the general organization which it has established. If this principle, therefore, have nothing in common with the Gospel of Jesus Christ, it will in the end effectually exclude all sense of its necessity, and almost of its existence; and if it be not actually the Gospel of Christ, it will admit but of partial views of that which we ought to comprehend as a whole. Languor and listlessness are the consequence, and repeated stumbling, from ignorance and carelessness, makes us disgusted with the road which has been pointed out. We are blaming in our hearts the severity of God, when we have to complain only of our own want of energy; and accusing the niggardness of light, which our earnest and sincere exertion is, according to his holy promise, assured of obtaining in satisfying fulness.

It is in perfect accordance with this narrowness of view, to sit down in idle expectation of some peculiar summons to begin upon the work of newness of life, as if all had not been summoned by their acquaintance with that Gospel, in the very front of which it is written,—"Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" as if all required that palpable interference which called the apostle of the Gentiles to his vast and extraordinary charge. But have they indeed had no call? Has God never been challenging their attention amid the multifarious incidents which he has strewn in their daily course, and the many desires or reluctances with which he has informed their spirit? Have they no remembrance of resolutions formed from time to time, none of hours of repentance, none of hours of hope, none of hours of that holy calm which instantly overspreads the bosom when it has formed some pious determination? All these were consequent upon some call of God, and are evidences that he has not been forgetful of them. But if they pass by such as these, in expectation of something more rousing, more special, of what nature may we reasonably conclude that to be which they await so complacently? God's ordinary dealings with man lead us to presume that it will come in the shape of some overwhelming visitation, which shall scatter their habitual frame of thought to the winds, dissevering all their usual links, and turning them with their affections from earth, weeping and dropping blood like the fabled myrtle; so that all being once again disentangled, they may grow together anew according to a new principle, which is Christ in the mind and in the heart. O, let no one wait for such a call as this to his duty!

We have now but just advanced within the commencement of one of those revolutions of time by which we number the days of our sojourn upon earth; a period upon which the most careless are accustomed to bestow some reflections;—for who can avoid throwing back a look upon days now parted for ever, and upon time which can never be recovered? Happy he who, in his present state of mind and practice, can find substantial records of past moments: to him, though bodily, they are not spiritually, past; they have an indissoluble link with the future,—they are the palpable earnest of eternal life,—the first-fruits, picked here and there, of an abundant harvest. Far different, indeed, is he whose restrospect is but a dream of barren thoughts and idle pursuits, where all is in wild disorder without the one grand object to unite them, and runs from the grasp of memory as freely as the sands of the hour-glass which have measured those precious moments. To him may well be addressed the words of the apostle,—"Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light," for he has been indeed sleeping; and the dreamer has been indulging, amid darkness and night, in fantastic and unbridled thoughts; he has been enjoying a world of his own, where he himself has been creator, and not

God, where all has gone according to his own capricious imagination, and the will of God has found no place; the sights and sounds of God's world have been excluded, and he has wasted the precious moments, reckless of place, insensible to the lapse of time, holding converse with unsubstantial beings, expending his affections upon fleeting shadows.

"Life is a dream," said the natural man. Let no Christian account of it so; for it is to him a time allotted by God for beginning and completing a most momentous work,—a work which is sufficient to fill up every part of it, to whatever length it may be extended,—which requires the ardour of youth, the steadiness of manhood, and the caution of old age. Let him not, therefore, defer an employment, the very commencement of which becomes daily more unsuitable to his years, and be like the tree which, when it should be bearing fruit, is but blossoming; for thus the very purpose of life will be eluded, and a work, whose difficulties demand the pride and bloom of the faculties, will be first imposed upon them in their decay; and what requires unabated vigour, unwearied watchfulness, unexhausted spirits, will be reserved for a bed of sickness, or decline of years, seasons of langour, indifference, and irresolution. True it is, that highly-gifted men have before now spoken in fond and complacent anticipation of setting apart some work, as the suitable employment and fit solace of their old age. But how different was the nature of that work from that which we have in contemplation. That was a work pleasingly associated with the past, not anxiously connected with the prospect of the future; it was a natural confirmation of previous habits, not a violent alteration; it was an amusement, not a toil; a minister to the mind, of pleasure, and not of pangs.

To-day, therefore, while it is called to-day, the work should commence. Who knows what impediments the morrow may bring? It may bring friends to delude, or enemies to confound; it may introduce calamity to bewilder our senses, sickness to paralyze our exertions, or death to cut short at once our miserable vacillation.

Each day, as it successively becomes to-day, is all that we can call our own: let us make it truly God's too, by dedicating it to his service, in sincere endeavours, by newness of life here, to realize the promise of everlasting life in the world to come, which he has given us in Christ Jesus our Saviour.

DISSERTATION XII.

ON THE REWARD OF OBEDIENCE.

But we trusted that it should have been he which should have redeemed Israel.—Luke xxiv. 21.

A PRIZE no less than everlasting happiness is proposed to the endeavours of man when he diligently seeks God. We have already seen that the expectation of this, which is so necessary both to engage him in the struggle of well-doing in the first instance, and to support him in it ever afterwards, was held forth from the very beginning of the Church; and Scripture assures us that it was earnestly cherished by Enoch, by Job, by Abraham,* by Moses,—testimony being also borne to the latter in a very remarkable passage (Matth. xxii. 31), by the great Bishop of our souls himself, and in short, distinctly informs us that it was a doctrine of the Patriarchal and Jewish church.†

From the first to the last prophecy, the ground of this hope is laid in a Redeemer to come; but the way in which God drew the attention of the members of his church upon it is different.

On that second apostacy of man, which drew on the dreadful visitation of the flood, God treated him as a creature in a still lower state of degradation; he dealed with him as with a wayward child, who is to be won to obedience by cates and delicacies, and not, as with a man, by cogency of reason. Man's spiritual sight had become so dim, that he could not look on the distant prospect of another life, without some middle point. To the original promise, therefore, of everlasting happiness, still remembered, he added that of temporal bliss, so that the completion of the one promise may remind and assure him of the certainty of the other also; that the taste of blissfulness, however fleeting, yet coming expressly from God, might lead his infant appetites to appreciate the promised happiness which should endure for ever, and that the toils and delays which are rewarded by the one may give him experience, and render him patient, long-suffering, unbroken in hope, under the still more serious difficulties to be encountered, through a still longer interval of suspense in the course of attaining the other. Hence Noah was both assured against a repetition of the calamity of the flood, and at the same time comforted with promises of fruitfulness and increase. As apostacy revives and increases, God at length interferes again, and deals with man as reduced a degree lower still. For under the Jewish dispensation, a grand feature of which was the settling that chosen people in a land flowing with milk and honey, so completely is the promise directed to temporal things, that we need not wonder why that carnal people, in despite of their prophets, continually recalling them to the original and universal spiritual promise, should have fondly imagined that themselves were the end, and not the vehicle, and that the magnificent series of words and deeds proposed by God to their ear and eye, referred but to their own national aggrandizement. Of this prevailing state of feeling we have a signal example in the words of the text, which come to us with peculiar interest as being uttered by men whose lives, being partly under the old dispensation and partly under the new, (of which themselves, under Christ, were founders,) exhibited in the first all the pride and carnality of the Jew, in the second, all the charity and spirituality of the Christian. These eminent and godly persons were among the first who grew up from the childhood, under which mankind was formerly considered in God's dealings, to the manhood of the Gospel, under which consideration we are now treated.

This manner of God's dealing with his chosen people will appear more peculiar and distinct, if we refer to the situation of the Gentiles. They had lost the original promise, or only knew it by a tradition so faint and so corrupt, that its influence was completely lost upon their moral conduct. They had no reward proposed to their obedience in this life, or in the next. What a contrast do they present to the people of God, even taking these latter at their very lowest degradation! In them we see to what our nature was indeed reduced by Adam's transgression, before yet it was raised again from the dust by God's gracious promise. Though he had lost both the possession and expectation of perfect happiness, man had still the appetite for it. So far from satisfying him, every enjoyment administered a craving for one more intense still; and while the beast lay down satisfied after his meal, and reckless of the future, man in his happiest moments was unhappy still, for he was still unsatisfied. In vain the philosopher sought the chief good, advanced from a bright to a brighter; still something remained behind to attain, and of that he in vain attempted to ascertain the nature. The search led him into a dim and tangled region, and there left him in miserable perplexity.

Thus was the Jew, in his temporal blessings, continually rebuked for his unmindfulness of the great spiritual blessing, and the Heathen abandoned to his ignorance of both, when, in the fulness of time, the original spiritual promise given to Adam, was accomplished in Jesus Christ. The restoration of man was now accomplished; a new heaven and a new earth had been created, and man also morally created anew in the second Adam. The life to come, with all its preparatory means, had been actually exemplified before the eyes of the world. Man, therefore, henceforward needed no intermediate object to draw him on; he rested at once upon the great end, which was now near, certain, and continually in sight. In this change of circumstances, can we wonder that the order of the objects of our aim is reversed, so that when any temporal blessing is pronounced, it is merely by the way, and quite accidental to the spiritual one; that we should be told to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then all these things shall be added unto us; and that while their expectation of spiritual good should be fed and maintained by the experience of temporal good, so our consciousness of possession should be proved by the trial of temporary evil? Here, indeed, lies one great point of contrast; here the spirituality of our dispensation is peculiarly shown. Where temporal blessings are a reward, and therefore temporal afflictions are naturally looked upon as a punishment, man, who is born to sorrow as the sparks fly upward, must have felt as under continual bondage. He must ever be either suffering the scourge, or in continual apprehension of it. And though, as appears from Scripture, good men had imbibed, through God's revelation, proper and spiritual notions on the nature of affliction, yet this did not accord with the deduction generally drawn from the law, and was rather the easing of the yoke to a favoured few, than the removal of it from any one. The very promise of the Holy Land, had been accompanied with threats of expulsion; and as that was the title to all his joy, so would these impart a character to affliction. If one was the reward of obedience, the other was the punishment of disobedience. When, too, the Jew looked to his history for the comfort of examples of affliction, if it presented him the instance of Job, for this one it gave him many others of a very different character. It offered to him Sampson, Eli, Saul, and David, all suffering for heavy transgressions, and bearing in their body the marks of the scourge of divine vengeance. But now to us Christians, since temporal blessings are but accidentally our reward, of course bodily sufferings are but accidentally our punishment; and in the greater number of instances can be regarded but as the turning away of our face from the importunate allurement of temporal enjoyment to the contemplation of spiritual; as the call given to inattention,—as the warnings to consider the fleeting state of all around,—as the race to be run before winning the crown,—as the refining fire whence the saint issues forth as pure and undrossed gold. Therefore they have been proclaimed to us in company with our everlasting inheritance, by him who said, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." They are not a hindrance, but a preparation. And therefore where Noah was promised the fatness of the earth, and Abraham enjoyed its inheritance, we are warned to expect its toils and miseries; where they were bound closer to earth, we are rudely shaken from it; where they were bidden to go to its enjoyment, we are sent to its denial. To us the world is indeed crucified, nor have we to reck either of its blessings or its sorrows, excepting in so far as we regard them as vehicles of grace; as furnishing that state, and affording that scope of action, without which the Christian character cannot be developed. There is no soldier where there is no war, and no victory where there is no battle. Then if we look round for companions in affliction, the very first who presents himself is the great Captain of our salvation; and we are amid the throng of the holy army of martyrs, and all the elect of the Church of Christ. What need indeed have we of any pledge supplied by bodily blessings, we who have a pledge so much more palpable, so much more accordant with our state of spiritual manhood; a pledge in the earnest of the spirit, in a real earnest, not in a gross carnal representation, but in an actual portion of the bliss to come, communicated through the sanctifying graces of the spirit. Thus we have actually a part of our reward in our hands, and not the bare distant prospect before our eyes; we see our freedom and election in the very quarter where our predecessor, the Jew, saw his bondage and reprobation. We are daily quelling through these means, some earthly enemy, rising from conquest to conquest; continually casting off something of the old man, over which Satan was victorious, and putting on something of the new, which is victorious over Satan; gradually growing into that image which has been restored to our nature through our great Redeemer, and approaching to that bliss of immortality, which, lost by the first Adam, has been regained for us by the second.

But this peculiar condition of the Christian, demands also peculiar considerations on his part. The life to come being placed so very palpably and prominently before him, and casting into shadow all the toils and troubles of this life; being ever present to us as the grand feature of the Gospel, mingling itself with all our thoughts and actions, it becomes so familiar to our minds,—so completely a thing of course, that we are apt to lose sight of the extraordinary value of the gift, and to under-rate, if not cast out of account, the difficulties which lie in the way of attaining it: we rest in the end, and become too indifferent to the means. Let us now, therefore, proceed to inquire into the view with which we should contemplate this prize, referring, for the sake of illustration, to those considerations which enhance the value of an earthly prize, and which may be reduced,—first, to our inadequacy of desert; second, to the distance from which the object once appeared to be removed from us; third, to the difficulties which have been overcome in the way.

On the first ground, let us look into our own hearts, and consider our nature as it is absolutely, without any relation to what it has received from God's restoring grace. What a scene is here! Can we discern in it a single seed of everlasting peace and joy? If it is to inherit such a blessed state, surely we ought to espy some elements of such in its constitution, and if the immortal principle, of which we feel conscious within ourselves, assures us of a world to come, should there not be corresponding traces in our frame of mind to assure us, as initiary elements, of the peace, and joy, and purity, of that world to come? But now let us look at that promised state of blessedness and glory, and then withdraw our eyes, to fix them upon our own bosoms. Can the tumult and disquiet of the pride, the pangs of the evil passions, the darkness of the ignorance which confront us here, have the least in common with the dazzling brightness of the peace, and innocence, and knowledge, which met us there? Can one, by any natural possibility, lead to the other? So far from this, would it not lead in a totally different direction? Yea, eternal death itself had been a signal mercy, had we been left thus by our offended Father in heaven. For that immortality, of which we have the seeds within us, could then have been no other than that enjoyed by the fallen angels; a woful prolongation to all eternity of the misery and degradation ensuing upon our apostacy. Had death, therefore, been our final doom, we should even then have stood in the place of a pardoned criminal. What shall we say, then, if God hath not only pardoned this criminal, but even restored him to his former rank and state of enjoyment? For from that dreadful immortality we have been rescued by our divine Redeemer; so that passing from this earthly state of sin through death, we may rise again to an immortality still more glorious than that in which the first man was placed. Can we arrive at any thing like a due estimate of this so great mercy; may we not despair of so doing in the words of the apostle,—"O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out." (Rom. xi. 33.)

Let us add to this the price at which this seeming impossibility of the union of our sinful nature with everlasting innocence and joy, has been purchased, being no less than the sacrifice of the Son of God in human nature upon the cross. What shall we say of the value of the prize proposed to us? Let the purest, the most heavenly-minded among us, carefully look into his bosom, discuss his own words, thoughts, and deeds, endeavour thus to discover his own real position, and then gaze up at the place to which his Redeemer's merits have advanced him. He will confess his own utter ineffable unworthiness, and adore the unspeakable love of Him who brought him the gift, and own, with tears of thankfulness and joy, its inestimable value. The cross, with all its previous and accompanying sorrows, pangs, and humiliation, led the way to the glorification of our human nature in Jesus Christ. On this contrast we should fix our look: reading in the one the extreme of misery and sin into which man had fallen, beholding the price, exceeding all powers of calculation, which was requisite to procure his redemption, to free him from the servitude of a tyrannous master, loth to forego his hold of a slave so manageable, in the possession of whom he enjoyed the consciousness of his power; and seeing in the other the exceeding bliss, such as never could enter into the thoughts of man, which is laid in store for him in the world to come. From this constant contemplation let him learn the utter inadequacy of his own deserts of eternal happiness; and in full reliance on the merits of his Saviour's sufferings, in deep humility at his own total unworthiness, looking to the end in steady and joyful hope, so work out his own salvation with fear and trembling.

On the second ground, we carry into our consideration of this heavenly prize, the same short-sighted and paltry views as we take up in our pursuit of earthly objects. Of these, whatever their intrinsic value may be, we are accustomed to prefer such as require least time to be passed in the toil of attainment; so that a very inferior object, attainable through a short interval, shall be preferred to a far more excellent, coming after a long period of labour and expectation. Thus we think and act, because time, in proportion to its length, admits of so many more intervening accidents, of so many more competitions, of so much more which may snatch the prize from our grasp. And thus the more splendid prizes of life being apparently removed from any given individual's attainment, seem in expectation the common property of all,—are admired, talked of, but never seriously striven after, except by minds of deep foresight and energy, which, fully aware of the difficulties, have also determined to overcome them. Now, though much of this habit of thought be inapplicable in the case before us, since neither rivals nor fortune can disappoint our exertions, still from inveterate habit we carry it into the consideration of this heavenly reward; which, excellent beyond the utmost power of our estimation, as all readily allow it to be, yet is placed at a far greater distance still than the remotest of earthy prizes, being even beyond the boundaries of this life. We prefer, therefore, though not in speculation, yet certainly in practice, any of the mean and fleeting enjoyments of the world present; and as a small object placed before the eye will cover the largest at a distance, so do the worthless prizes of this life, one succeeding to the other, cover from view the glorious reward of the life to come. It is well for us if we can obtain a steady glimpse or two between the intervals of this succession; and better still if we can retain the impression which has been made. But moreover, those very points which render our mode of contemplating earthly prizes inapplicable here, add to our carelessness. Where the chances of fortune are removed, all seems to be certainty; internal impediments are forgotten, where external do not obtrude on our sight,—where all may obtain, all are slack; and thus the small degree of exertion which is seen around them, comes at last to most men to appear quite adequate to the end, and they bestow indiscriminately on themselves and their friends, the certain expectation of this precious inheritance, when neither they nor themselves have moved perhaps a foot, or lifted so much as a hand, or directed even an eye towards the desire of its attainment.

On the third ground, of the difficulties to be surmounted, men are apt to run into extremes,—the reckless never bestow a thought upon them,—those who for the first time opening their eyes to the prospect of eternity, are too apt to be scared at the awful front which they present: habitual contemplation alone can place them in their proper point of view, and administer a wholesome fear to the carelessness of the one, and supply a cheerful hope to the despondency of the other. If the attainment be indeed so easy, to what purpose were the incredible toils and sufferings of the apostles, and all the martyrs and confessors of the church? If it be so insurmountably difficult, who even of that glorious company can be pronounced among the saved? But however impossible to man, this is possible to God; and his grace preventing and furthering us, will gain us the victory in the end. Without this all human exertion were indeed vain: as well would man attempt to move the earth towards heaven. While we have the assurance of this help from above, who shall despond, who rather shall not be sanguine? But let him be sanguine, and derive the testimony to the possession of this grace, from the consciousness of his own exertions; let him expect grace from God's promise; let him find its possession from his own operations. But the number of the despondents is few indeed, compared with that of the confident. Let, then, these latter open the page of Scripture, and read what is told them there. Are we not there told that our fleshy appetites must be crucified, even as our Lord was crucified; that if we think to enjoy with Christ, we must also suffer with him? that we are soldiers in a warfare, wrestlers in a struggle, runners in a race? that our best human affections may be taken captive, that our faith may suffer shipwreck, that our surest foot may slide or stumble? and thus by a multitude of similar figures scattered throughout, are we not continually called back from that state of the good easy man in which we are so fond of indulging,—awakened from that drowsiness which is so often surprising us? And yet all this while, that we are indifferent to the labours which shall find our only true reward, we will not cease forsooth from those toils which bring the rewards of this life, paltry and fleeting though they be. O no! we will put body and mind on the rack; we will sacrifice peace, yea, even of the mind; surrender all comforts of the body; rising early and taking rest late, looking ever steadfastly and patiently to the end. All this we will do, and yet shrink from the exertions which lead to eternal life. God give us grace and wisdom to estimate the nature of those exertions, as superior in excellence to such as procure an earthly prize, as their reward is. These are often hurtful, even fatal to bodily health: those nourish our spiritual health. These prepare the way of death, those of everlasting life. This struggle brings into play all the uneasy disquieting affections of our corrupt nature,—anger, envy, jealousy, discontent, strife; nay, even heresy, sedition, and murder. While that developes all the Christian graces, unfolds our best affections, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. This may indeed, at best, serve to keep the mind, by means of occupation, from sundry temptations; but that puts it beyond all possible reach of them. That, is a spirit dispelling the whole train of temptations; this, is often slack and interrupted, because of the uncertainty of the prize. To that the prize is as certain as the word of God, who is truth, is true. This, may be given up through despair, on our encountering more powerful competitors: that, is encouraged, and never can be depressed by rivalry. Here only one can attain, there all may be rewarded. This, we may have an aversion to engage in on good principles; that, we can never relinquish but upon bad. Sad humiliating testimony all this to the corruption of our nature, which will so readily undertake the former; so uniformly and willingly turn from the latter.

And what right have we, restless indefatigable wordlings, to complain of difficulties? do we not consider that the very difficulties which obstruct the road of attainment, enhance the value of an earthly prize; and does not this enhanced value reflect in return upon the difficulties, and lighten their burden? and shall we refuse this cheering solace in seeking a heavenly prize; and shall we who can be so patient in working even against God, and at all events without God, become desponding the moment that we begin to work with him, and he with us?

But some one may here object that we have a clear view of our earthly prizes, and an understanding of them so distinct that we know exactly how to time, to temper, and to direct our exertions; we know when to lie down in security against their loss, when to rise up in the certainty of their attainment, and thus we work our way onward with the cheerful willingness arising from knowing that our exertions are proportionate. But we are to a very great extent ignorant of the nature of our heavenly prize, except that no exertions of man can of themselves be proportionate, and, therefore, we cannot experience that readiness and reasonable confidence. Now, in answer to this we may be content to ask this simple question: Are our notions indeed so clear concerning the nature of the objects of our worldly exertions? What, indeed! do we never find them on attainment vastly inferior to the appearance which they made when in prospect? do we always find them a resting-point upon the past, or but the commencement of fresh and still more wearying toils to come? do we find them all that we expected, or of an entirely contrary nature,—opposed as gall to honey, as war to peace, as life to death,—and telling us that we have sown the wind, and reaped the whirlwind? do we set up there our staff of rest, or on our arrival hear a voice cry out, "On, on," and find at this long-expected stage of bliss, that to stay is imminent hazard, to go on is destruction, to return is an impossibility? If faithful experience informs us thus of our real ignorance of the true nature of our earthly prizes, shall we carp at our everlasting reward, which indeed is not, as they are, contrary to our previous notions, but infinitely surpassing them; while more of its nature has been revealed, there is more than enough to engage us with all confidence to seek to attain. What! do not these objectors take measures for length of life? here is life eternal. Do they not strive for fading earthly crowns? here is an everlasting heavenly crown. Do they not covet peace, rest, joy, gladness? here is peace, rest, joy, gladness, unutterable, inextinguishable. All that is lovely, all that is of good report, all that is truly desirable in the prizes of this world is to be found here, and in a higher state of perfection in the proportion of heaven to earth; nay more, even our sense of enjoyment, exquisite as it may seem, and full of blessing to us, even when most spiritualized,—is but an element, poor and beggarly, of that taste of unutterable bliss, which shall be the joy of the world to come. Independently, therefore, even of God's constant help and encouragement, we work onwards in this case with a more reasonable hope than in the case of the most assured, best understood, and most highly valued of earthly prizes. Again, what right have we to complain of difficulties, if he who hath proposed the prize hath duly forewarned us of them,—hath directed us how to overcome them, and pledged to us his assistance in overcoming them: when he has set both before us, shall we think to take up the one without the other, the wages without the labour? No,—to this latter we must direct our chief attention, as the means to the former; we must weigh well the cost, and instead of resting in easy security on the end, or looking with vain and ambitious curiosity into the nature and degree of the fruition of the glory which God hath not revealed, diligently address ourselves to the duties which he has revealed, which he demands of us as heirs of that glory. Our reward is indeed in heaven, but we and our work are upon earth; there is the bliss, and the life eternal; here is the Cross, and the grave: not that earth and his toils on earth are to have the entire eye of the Christian, and that it shall never be lifted up to take in the ample bright sky of bliss and glory above. For to that glory, even the invisible glory which the Son enjoys with the Father, every face in heaven and in earth, of angels and of men, must be turned in rapt contemplation, crying out in spirit to one another, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Host, heaven and earth are full of thy glory." The contemplation of this is in fact the food of intelligence to every rational being, in all gradations down to man; and exclusion from this is to man that second death, which shuts out from the invisible realms of our Lord and Master, even as the first does from the visible. This according to the degree of intensity with which it is viewed, assigns to every intelligent being his rank in the creation, and its degree of perception distinguishes the spiritual from the natural man. But far different from such a contemplation is the vain and curious anticipation of that glory which shall be imparted to the faithful, in the kingdom of the next world; for this, drawing away the attention from the work set before us, no less than from the real glory before mentioned, is as unsure and unfounded as it is impure and selfish. It is the fabric of worldly lost and ambition, the heaven which we build for ourselves on pride; it is a view so gross and so unworthy, that we cannot but embody it in our human passions and conceptions,—a state into which we admit ourselves by thrusting others out, and therefore, like the disciples whose words have been quoted for the text, we shall be grievously disappointed in the hour of trial. Whenever, therefore, we do contemplate the glory which shall reward the faithful servants of Christ, we must look at it with that comprehensive glance, which shall at the same time include all the difficulties which lie in the way; with a heart set at least as much upon suffering and overcoming the one, as upon attaining and possessing the other. The future bliss will thus be to us in spirit, what the sun is in the body to the man who is intent upon his work before him. For that sun, while it shines over his head, cheers him in his toils, lights him to his labour, enabling him to direct his hand unerringly to its object, and satisfies him with the consciousness of its presence, imprest by its effects; yet will not bear long and direct contemplation, without dazzling his sight, and rendering the idle gazer inefficient for his work. And assuredly the work set before the labourer in Christ's vineyard demands all his clearness of vision, all his steadiness of contemplation; that, unseduced and undismayed by appearances, he may penetrate through them into realities, turning away from unsubstantial good to look with an unaverted eye upon danger and trouble, —upon agony, the cross and the grave; and thence at length to gaze up in unshrinking hope at the glory which shall be revealed in the end.

Having drawn a lesson from the errors of these two disciples, let us derive another from their correction of those errors. If, at the moment of their uttering those despondent words, they were the predecessors of all those unstable Christians, who, offended with the uncalculated and continual struggle to be undergone by spirit against flesh; thrown into despair by the hourly jeopardy in which they are held by surrounding trials and temptations; and tost about by the fluctuation of their own unsettled notions, and by winds of diverse doctrines, and longing for rest and finding none, cry out in their vexation and disappointment, "we thought it had been he who should redeem Israel;"—so also were they, in their after-life, the predecessors of all those Christians, who have persevered unshaken to the end, and have bequeathed to us a glorious example of what the Spirit of God can effect in the heart of man. They were among the captains of that noble host of martyrs and confessors, who fought a long and unwearied fight, in the cause of their Master, against the world and its prince; who struggled daily, and daily triumphed, against pains of body, pangs of mind; who, familiar with sorrow as their most intimate companion in this life, ate their bread amid groans, and mingled their drink with tears; to whom all things came adverse; whom nothing disheartened; to whom loss of fortune, loss of friends, cold, hunger, nakedness, and the sword, came as signals from their blessed leader,—as in the crisis of a desperate battle,—to take up a new and still more perilous post, and engage with redoubled ardour; who quitted the world as conquerors, leaving behind them an enemy, with whom they had made no compromise, to whom they had surrendered no fortress.

DISSERTATION XIII.

THE PROFESSION OF A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH OF GOD.

Seeing then that we have a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession.—Heb. iv. 14.

The word Profession is used in Scripture in two senses; either properly, for the free acknowledgment of our belief in the promises of God; or improperly, for those promises themselves. Either sense will suit the passage before us, and bring it to the same result in meaning. We will, however, consider it in the former sense, inasmuch as it necessarily implies the latter, and affords more scope for a full examination of the text.

At the moment when man is admitted into covenant with God, or performs any act, as prayer or sacrifice, under that covenant, it is necessary that he bring with him two things; namely, repentance, by which he shall renounce the past, and faith, by which he shall accept the future; meeting with the one, the forgiveness of God,—with the other, his gifts of grace and the life to come. These, which are the subjects of his private acknowledgment before God, are also the grounds of his profession before men. These supply the declarations of his lips, these are the base and support of his practice. By the uninterrupted exhibition of these in word and deed through life, he holds fast his profession.

The nature of that repentance, and of that faith, as held in the different stages of the Church, we have already seen. According as they are more deep and full, the profession will be more strict and firm. There is, moreover, a circumstance accompanying this profession, which requires our notice, and which will be found to vary in the different periods.

In his communications with man, God deposits ever with him some pledge by which to assure him. And thus we find the inspired men of old, as Isaiah and Zachariah, demanding of God a sign, in order to be certified of the reality of the communication. Again,—societies formed amongst men necessarily require some badge by which their members shall be distinguished from the rest of mankind. When God, therefore, establishes his covenant with a portion of mankind, these two reasons will concur to distinguish them by a mark, which, on the part of God, will be some symbol or representation of the benefit conferred; on the part of man, a badge, reminding him of his peculiarity amid the great body of mankind. Such marks are circumcision and baptism.

Where, then, it may be asked, is the mark impressed on the member of the Patriarchal church? In the first place, since this church contained all mankind, none could be necessary on the part of man. Again, on the part of God, on whose covenant with Adam that church was founded, the very existence of man, which had been forfeited, and then restored in Adam,—the very sight of fellow men,—the very breath which each each moment drew, was a symbol most significant indeed; a symbol, too, which, however added to, has never been superseded. As we all, at this very day, bear in our bodies the traces of the offence of Adam, so do we also of his pardon.

It may also be asked, why, since in Christ the church is once more opened to all mankind, is the badge of baptism required? That it was necessary on the part of God, as entering into covenant with man, we have seen. That it is necessary on the part of man is evident, because, though all are actually born of the flesh of the first Adam, all are but potentially born in the spirit of the second Adam, and this distinction will obtain to the end. The Patriarchal church was founded in the hope of the Redeemer to come,—a hope which would be the inheritance of all mankind down from their head and representitive: the Christian church was founded on the accomplishment of the Redeemer come, and men have no general representitive under whom they can be certified of this fact; they must come to the knowledge of it gradually and partially. This farther appears from the connexion of baptism with circumcision. This latter rite exhibited a twofold view,—one a temporal, which it confined to the Jew, conveying to him his right of inheritance to the land of Canaan, and other privileges derived from his father Abraham, and to which the mark in the flesh appertained as the seal: the other a spiritual, admitting to the kingdom of heaven all mankind, in virtue of the original covenant with Adam, through means of his promised seed, which was now restricted to the line of Abraham. To this belonged the circumcision of the heart, without which qualification it was indiscernible; and to this baptism is the successor, administering in substance what this conveyed in hope. But as that spiritual circumcision, though not represented, was conveyed by the circumcision of the flesh, and as this latter is abolished by the abolition of the law, a new seal must be established; and this seal is a lively symbol of the blessing conveyed. It is immersion in water, which represents to us our death to sin and new birth to righteousness, analogous to the death and resurrection of Christ; and also in the washing of our bodies expresses the washing of our souls by the merits of his blood, and their purification by the sanctifying graces of the Holy Spirit. Aptly with its spiritual sense it leaves no mark upon the flesh, but having performed the part of the seal and sign of God's covenant, quits all farther hold of the body, and surrenders the person to all his heavenly privileges.

Our profession, as compared with that of the Patriarch and Jew, will be this. We profess, with them, to repent, and renounce the world and its lusts; to die to sin, and live again unto righteousness. But we do this with such a death and life being made especially imperative upon us, being also actually proposed and represented to us in the death and resurrection of the author of our forgiveness. We also profess our entire faith in the truth of his promises. But the greater part of what were promises to them are gifts to us; and such gifts as still remain in expectance, and not in possession, are rendered distinct, appreciable, and certain from the accomplishment of the others; they have even been exemplified to us: the life after death in the resurrection of the Lord, the bounteous gifts of his spirit in the graces and powers of his saints, from the day of Pentecost until now. Thus our profession is distinctly marked out to us: there is no room for doubt, no excuse for vacillation; it is not shadowy, so as to elude the grasp, it is not indefinite in any point, so as at times to escape from it; it is so substantial, so comprehensible, that if we hold it not fast, the fault lies with our own weakness and wavering. What had Adam, what had Abraham, what had the Prophets for the grounds of their profession, compared with this? Verily, the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than them all.

The most practical part of our profession lies in the renunciation of the world, whose ways, having been far more openly detected, and awfully condemned by the Gospel than by any previous dispensation, we are more peculiarly called upon to reprobate and abandon. What fellow-feeling can a true child of God in Christ have with it? It is bent on the joys and pleasures of this life, therefore the Cross of Christ, with its crucifying afflictions, is a stumbling-block to it. It is wise in its own conceit, and therefore that Cross is foolishness to it; it worships rank and power, and therefore that Cross is contemptible to it. It loves its own will and ways, and therefore that Cross is hateful to it. As the convert in baptism takes a new name to show that he is a new creature, so must he take up new names for the things of the world, in which he moves as a new creature; its joy will be his sorrow, its good his evil,—in all things a new vocabulary will be adopted.

The Jew bore on his body the mark of his calling in Abraham; however, and wherever, he lived, his flesh bore testimony to his being a member of that covenant which gave his nation the inheritance to the land of Canaan. But our mark must be on the spirit, as heirs of a spiritual kingdom, never to be oblitered there. That mark must be a peculiarity of thought, originating a peculiarity of action, by which we may be distinguished from those without; word, and thought, and deed, must all have upon them the stamp of the cross of Christ. Even where we are obliged, from our common nature, to feel and do as other men, yet here we shall discover the mark of our calling. This feeling and doing will go but a short way with the world: if developed into any continued train of reflection, or expanded into any deliberate act, the eye will immediately discover its peculiar form, and acknowledge in it our profession. How should it be otherwise? We see how deeply the characters and conversation of men are imbued with the spirit of their worldly professions. The soldier, the scholar, the merchant, carry each the peculiar stamp of their occupation into their most free and disengaged moments. Their thoughts cannot without some effort be broken up from those clusters into which the due performance of their several duties has a tendency to combine them. And the more strictly they perform those duties, and the more signal their success, the deeper also is the tinge of this mark. Should it, therefore, be otherwise with the Christian, the exercise of whose profession is not, like theirs, limited to certain places and certain seasons; who is not now in full occupation, and then in utter leisure, but is ever engaged, and has before his eyes for his reward, not the honours or wealth of this fleeting world, but the bliss of the world everlasting? Shall not his mouth speak from the fulness of his heart? And if the soldier's heart be in the camp, the merchant's in his freighted vessels, so that the language of the one would sound absurd from the mouth of the other; shall there be no such distinction between the man of this world, and the man of the next? Their heart cannot have the same object, and can therefore the language of the one proceed from the mouth of the other, without an immediate and glaring contradiction to his profession? Shall a clean vessel pour forth what is unclean? Shall a heart overflowing with love, joy, and thankfulness, for the mercies of God shown in our redemption,—shall a mind exalted in the Spirit, far beyond the pitch to which the natural man could attain, supported daily by the daily soaring contemplation of the unravelled mysteries of God,—shall these send forth no language of their own, shall they speak but as worldlings speak? It cannot be. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament telleth his handiwork;" and shall the great work of God's hands, a living spirit, twice-created, regenerated man, shall not his voice be heard among them? Shall not the glory of God be manifested from him, the chief of God's works, and cast in his own image? This is the Christian's profession: thus he must be a shining light amid darkness, telling from his firmament by an inextinguishable brightness of character, and by duly regulated motions of conduct, the glory, and the power, and the dominion, and the majesty of the almighty author of his salvation.

It is true that in no case should we think too highly of ourselves. But in the case of our station and corresponding profession as Christians, we can never think highly enough; and our constant endeavour must be to proceed from a higher to a higher pitch, so that the note and song of our profession may, like the trumpet of God, wax louder and louder. Look at the proud ones of this world, at them who do indeed think of themselves more highly than they ought. What a constant, jealous vigilance is there to maintain their dignity; what a cautious mingling with the general world; what a barrier do they try to throw around their communications, in order to keep off all intrusion of vulgar taint. Shall not then the Christian, whose honour is real and not conventional; inward and essential, not outward and accidental; derived from a heavenly incorruptible fountain, not from an earthly and corruptible; from eternity, not from yesterday; immortal, and not perishing;—shall not he guard this with equal vigilance and scrupulosity, and keep it pure and unspotted from the world? Still more, if earthly rank, which lives on the breath of the world, and which is averse but to its conventional and not real impurities, can draw a line of separation, shall not the follower of the Cross of Christ, which is at enmity with the world, and loathes all its impurities, shall he not trace around him a clear decided mark of distinction?

Having thus viewed the nature of our profession, in reference to our daily practice, let us proceed to apply the argument of the apostle in the passage from whence the text has been taken.

The persons to whom he writes were suffering under severe persecution, under the most trying of all, namely, that which comes from their own countrymen, and the professors of the religion which they had abandoned; and so trying had it already been, that several apostacies seem to have taken place, and more to be about taking place. He shows them, therefore, the ground on which, in this case, they should stand, and hold fast their profession. It is the ground of Jesus Christ having suffered before them, and, after his sufferings, ascended into rest and glory. And that not only thus had they an example in their Master, and a pledge of a similar reward to similar sufferings, but moreover that he is sitting now at the throne of God as High Priest, in intercession for us, in which we can securely repose all confidence, inasmuch as we know, from his sufferings here, that he can sympathise with us. The apostle has here only applied a particular example to meet a particular occasion. But his argument is applicable to every circumstance of life; for there is not one in which the firmness of grasp with which we hold fast our profession, is not more or less put to the proof. Now since life is made up of joy and sorrow, the latter of which has been met by the apostle, let us, with an argument from the same source, meet the former. We have, indeed, only to reverse the order of the argument, and as he argued from Christ's affliction to his joy, so must we from his joy to his affliction. When, through the abundant mercy of God, our hearts are overflowing with joy, amid the bounties of this life, shall we go no further; shall we stay at the limits of the body, and not proceed in spirit, and as we gladly refer our afflictions to his, so also our joys? Shall we not soar on the wings of this, at best, imperfect joy, to that glorious presence where it reigns in its fulness, and join the heavenly choir in the song of triumph to the Redeemer; and then, seeing through what afflictions his joy was perfected, prepare our hearts to meet such interruption, so that when it shall come, we may trample it under foot as conquerors,—having learned to fix our looks, steadfast and unaverted, on the everlasting joys of heaven,—having, through a right use of our allotted season of joy, attained the inseparable fellowship of that joy, which no man can take away from us, from which none of the weapons of this world, be they famine, persecution, or the sword, shall ever have power to divide us? Thus, through all the changes of this mortal life, we shall hold fast our profession, shall stand rooted in the faith of Christ Jesus, who suffered, and now reigneth in glory.

The apostle's expression, "let us hold fast our profession;" and a little above, "let us labour to enter into that rest,"—implies that this firmness of hold on our profession, has a continual resistance opposed to it. Hence it will be different at different times in the same man, growing as he does from strength to strength; and it will be different in different persons, according to the progress they have made in that faith which overcometh the world. The whole body of Christians, therefore, will present a motley appearance, and may, from the unbeliever,—to whose eye the weak, as most numerous, and more in contact with himself, will be much more obvious than the strong,—draw forth the charge of hypocrisy or superstition. But to the mind of the lowly and charitable Christian, a very different result will arise, and a lesson will be taught him full of warning and instruction. In the Church of God there must be a series of believers of different attainments, stretching from him who has but a moment ago quitted the gross elements of the world, to him who has far advanced into the regions of the spirit,—from the newly born infant, to the full grown man. There will, however, be a clear mark of distinction between the lowest of these beings and the world. They will all have this common character, namely, that they are striving to attain that; however weak their flesh may be, yet their spirit is willing. All are engaged in a race: some, therefore, are foremost, some hindmost; but these last are very distinct from the mere lookers on, which are the sons of this world. And the most backward Christian will be distinguished above the mere man of morals, inasmuch as the latter will be stationary, while the former is pressing on. The latter may, indeed, at a given moment, be standing nearer the goal of moral perfection, while the former may be at some distance; but then the one never leaves his place, the other is continually advancing, and in due time passes beyond. Even at his farthest distance from the goal, he will show that he is a racer, and not a spectator, by the proofs which he gives of his will to proceed; which are, his readiness to acknowledge and repair his offences, his self-rebuke for his failings, his lowliness to ask his neighbour's forgiveness, and charity to impart his own; and a careful record kept in his memory of the places in which he has hitherto stumbled, with a resolution to avoid the like mishap again. Spirit-stirring, indeed, is such a view of the companions of his profession, to the Christian. He will in charity place every neighbour more forward than he really is in the race; in humility he will place himself more backward, and setting himself down, in his own opinion, among the last, will the most earnestly pursue his resolution to be among the first.

We may consider the resistance opposed by the world to our profession, and our gradual triumph over it, in another light. We are thus engaged in a spiritual fight with it, and must have many wounds before we be conquerors. Were it not so, the enemy would yield at the first blow; ever as we advanced, all would flee in rout and dismay, all the strongholds of sin would surrender at the very first summons which we blew with the trump of the Gospel. Our course upon earth would be a glorious uninterrupted triumph, and the gates of heaven would unfold, and receive us unwounded, unfatigued. But be who he will, the Christian has to fight an obstinate, a continual fight; and like those kings, who, fighting for earthly kingdoms, have, by severe defeats, well nigh lost their own, and won, at last, after a long series of doubtful success; so, also, fares this spiritual king,—so fights he for a heavenly kingdom, nor can he cry out victory, but with his dying breath. Then, indeed, and not till then, he may. in a sense as opposite as his thoughts are to those of the apostate king, exclaim, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!" And thanks be to him who giveth us the victory, even Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Though the water of baptism hath left no outward mark upon us, to put us in continual remembrance of our profession, yet several of its accompaniments remain, and should produce this effect upon us. Our very name is one of them, and as that of Eve, which she received after the promise of the seed; of Abraham, after the promise of the Christ; of Paul, after his conversion to Christ; forcibly reminded them of their change of circumstances: so should ours carry us back to the moment, when, being admitted into covenant with Christ, our condition was changed, and there was created for us a new earth, and a new heaven: behold! all things were new. But still more should the titles, of which we thenceforward became possessors, declare unto us in most awful terms our profession. "Christian," should proclaim to us that we are followers of Christ, and have placed our will under obedience to his will. "Children of God," should suggest that we were once mere non-enties, but have been born into a world of real spiritual existence, and must be daily growing towards the mature and perfect man. "Inheritor of the kingdom of heaven," should continually preach unto us the high prize for which we are contending; assure the certainty of our reward, if we continue faithful to the end. "Saints in light," should remind us of the holiness of the profession to which we have been called, of the gift of the sanctifying graces of the Holy Spirit; of the light of the Gospel into which we have been brought, from the darkness of the ignorance of the natural man. If the titles indicative of rank, merit, or wealth, accorded by the society of the world, perpetually stimulate their possessors to maintain the substance which they represent,—without which they are a shadow, or even convey a reproach upon their bearer, how much more shall the sound of his titles operate upon the member of the fellowship of the saints, of the society of the Church of God.

Great, indeed, is our happiness, glorious our condition. We have not received the seal of circumcision, to assure us of a Redeemer to come in the latter days,—we have not received the giftless baptism of John, to prepare us for Christ on the point of coming; but we have received the baptism in Jesus Christ our Redeemer, who has come, and has shed upon us an abundance of spiritual gifts. All which God gave to mankind separately and at long intervals from the beginning of the world, hath been poured in one concentrated shower upon us; yea, and not only that, but what they of old received were not only but a part of what we have, but the rude and beggarly elements of the corresponding part which has come to us. Yea, and not only that, but all which they received, even in the perfect and ripe state in which they have been bestowed upon us, form but a part of our bounteous whole. Sacrifice, in all its relations and bearings, has been perfected; all its mystic meanings laid open; prophecy has been accomplished, and our food is certainty instead of hope. The Holy Spirit hath poured forth in profusion all his gifts. Not a doubt remains to perplex us, not a desire is left to be fulfilled. The groans of the creature have ceased. The very terms of our baptism, which was in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, declare the entire plenitude of the heavenly possessions which have been committed to us, and the effulgence and completeness of the revelation which we are enjoying. Bearing these things in mind, let us engage with all fortitude in this warfare below, and manfully fighting under Christ's banner, against the world, the flesh, and the devil, continue his faithful soldiers and servants to our life's end; so that having realized our baptism into the death of Christ, we may become joyful partakers of the bliss of his resurrection.

DISSERTATION XIV.

ON THE PRINCIPLES OF MORALITY IN THE CHURCH OF GOD.

For I desired to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.—1 Cor. ii. 2.

These forcible expressions are supposed to have been directed by St. Paul against the teachers of two systems,—most fruitful sources each of early heresy,—the questions of Greek philosophy, and of Jewish tradition; which were then vexing a church, conspicuous among the primitive seats of the Gospel for its lamentable divisions. Not unacquainted with either system, as we know St. Paul to have been, yet he deprecates most earnestly their being brought to bear in any degree upon the Gospel, to mix their turbid streams in the smallest portion with its purity; and reminds the Corinthians how he himself had preached it among them, with all simplicity and strict adherence with its principles, to an utter abandonment of all foreign knowledge, as if the existence of those systems had been wholly unknown to him.

It had been well if this wholesome example had been more generally followed. But down even to our own day, man has been ever thinking that he can mend God's work, interpolating his own conceits among the fundamental principles of the Gospel; and reason, deeming its province intruded upon by revelation, has been struggling to remove the boundaries which have been set to her previously too loosely defined dominion. This has been peculiarly the case in those questions which concern the duties of life. It was indeed to be expected. Their throng, their hourly occurrence, their ingrossing interest, their worldly complexion,—are all calculated to induce men to refer them to principles much more accommodated to their own carnal notions, to sources much nearer at hand than the spirituality of the Gospel will allow. And thus not only in practice, but in theory too, a mixture has been made of the light of nature and of the illumination of the Gospel, which, while it obscures both, is more particularly injurious to the latter, in proportion to its superior strength and brightness.

It readily follows, from what has been stated in the review of the fundamental articles of the church of God, that the moral conduct of a true member of this church, could never at any period be guided by principles which drew so much from the light of nature, as the reasoners above alluded to are ready to suppose. But as the Christian dispensation is that which they have in view in all their references to religious motives, we will confine the question to this point, and consider the rule of life laid down to the member of the church of Christ. In other words, we will proceed to ascertain how the doctrine of Christ crucified, bears upon those duties which moral philosophers would fain have us derive from principles which themselves have laid down.

It will be necessary to devote a few previous observations upon their different systems, so general, however, that they will be considered as forming only two classes; in one of which the light of nature alone is consulted, in the other the aid of that of revelation is called in.

The first contains the several systems of ancient philosophy. Their deficiency in not supplying a motive of obligation sufficiently obvious, strong and permanent, has been the subject of frequent remark. Nevertheless, they are of inestimable value to the Christian scholar, not only from disclosing to him the peculiar points upon which a revelation was required to bear,—not only from the interest which they excite by the heart-moving comparison of their original light of nature with our acquired illumination from the Gospel; but principally because they have almost exhausted the storehouse of human thought upon their subjects. Hither, therefore, the infidel will appeal, and here the Christian must be prepared to meet him, and make him feel the untenableness of his ground.

The second class is obviously destitute of all these advantages. It remains to see whether their loss has been counterbalanced by the acquisition of any others.

Perceiving the defect above mentioned, of the ancient systems, the authors of these have thought to supply it by calling in from revelation the doctrine of a state of future retribution. To this plan, however, there are insurmountable objections, not only from reason, but also from the revelation itself, whence they have borrowed.

There is an objection in reason, first, because in a system of philosophy all ought to be traceable to one source; and this character forms the great beauty of all the ancient systems. On such a principle, therefore, a future state to which the system attaches the final motive of obligation, ought to be demonstrable, equally with the rule of life, from the light of nature; but every one knows that it is not. Thus the system is deranged, and its logical unity dissolved by the introduction of an entirely foreign and independent principle.

A second objection on the ground of reason is, that our assent to the doctrine of a future retribution implies an adequate notion of the divine justice. But this (as in the case of other of God's attributes) must be derived from our notions of human justice. Thus we are conducted by such a system in a vicious circle. We must have formed an adequate notion of human justice, before we can assent to the position of a future retribution; and we must assent to the position of a future retribution, before we can possess ourselves with an adequate notion of human justice. But the objections from the very revelation itself, to which they profess themselves indebted, are of a still more serious cast.

In borrowing this doctrine from revelation, they have entirely neglected to take with them the foundation upon which it rests,—the Cross of Christ. It has accordingly shared the fate of all facts which are introduced, detached from the natural relation of surrounding circumstances. It droops and dies, as a tree which has been transplanted without its roots; and as far as the planters are concerned, the roots have been left to perish too: for what is now their position as they lay down their transplanted doctrine of a state of future happiness?—however stated, it amounts to this,—that a man may be saved by the law which they have there established. It is difficult to see how this materially differs from an opinion so severely reprobated by our church, (and in that reprobation every Christian church and person will join,) namely, that "every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law, and the light of nature." This is indeed removing the offence of the Cross, by removing the Cross itself; for (as our article proceeds to say, Art. 18.) Holy Scripture doth set unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby man must be saved.

Let it, however, be allowed (for argument's sake) that this consequence from their system has been too closely pressed. Let it even be granted that advantage has been taken of unintentional omission, of neglect of fortifying points, of latitude of language. Still the effect cannot be disputed, which is to instil into minds not culpably unwary, the above pernicious opinion, and to lead them to think the grand and essential facts of Christianity,—our Lord's incarnation, death, and burial,—an useless show, a cumbrous machinery, the employment of which seems derogatory to the wisdom of Almighty God. Is it considerate, is it charitable, is it dutiful to our crucified Master, to employ, or allow to be employed, a carelessness of expression pregnant with such dreadful consequences?

Putting, however, the best colour upon all this, still we find another objection behind, which cannot be set aside by any plea of mere looseness of language.

For let us supply what they may assert to be an unintentional omission; then, since of course a system of morality is applicable to all mankind, their position stands thus: that all men, by observing the duties which the system has laid down, will enjoy the future happiness which has been procured by the Cross of Christ. But where is such a position to be found in Scripture? Where has it promised a state of happiness to all mankind, upon living up to their duties? Its promises are confined exclusively within the pale of the Christian covenant, and the salvability of any without can be but the suggestion of a charitable hope; or (granting the very utmost) a fit subject of argument for such as are prepared to engage in an interminable controversy.

Thus, even upon putting the most favourable construction upon the systems of this class, we are obliged to conclude that their foundation rests upon a position, of which they affirm the certainty from revelation, but which in fact is not to be found in any part of its records.

It may, however, still be asserted that such systems, though not applicable to all mankind, may serve to point out a rule of moral conduct to the Christian, supplying directions where the Scriptures are not practically explicit, presuppose natural principles; or perhaps are silent altogether. The state of the question, thus narrowed, brings us back to the point which was proposed to be examined, and will render much assistance to the course of argument, by setting off in more prominent relief the peculiarities with which the doctrine of Christ crucified invests all those duties which are the subjects of moral philosophy.

Let it be borne in mind, that, according to the latter systems just discussed, the motive which obliges the Christian, is the simple one of a certain expectation of future reward or punishment. According to the Gospel, it will appear to be one much more complex, or at least (even granting this to be the final), that it can never be acted upon by him except in association with a number of others of a certain class. Their rule of life also is sought among the principles of nature. In the Gospel it presupposes these, but is not confined to them; so that the Christian, calculating from those principles only, would as certainly fall into error, as he who omits important elements in any deduction of science. They suppose only two persons—man and God. The Gospel interposes a third, the Son of God; and this of course immediately gives a new complexion to the whole question.

God the Father has made the promise of everlasting happiness to man, upon obedience to his will, operating through faith in the merits of his only begotten Son, Jesus Christ; who, by taking our nature upon him, suffered death upon the Cross, in order to procure for man that inestimable blessing. But the Father, notwithstanding this reconciliation, has no immediate communication with man: he will turn away his ear from every note of praise or prayer, he will avert his face from every posture of supplication, which is not addressed to him through the mediation of the Son; through him he bids him look for every blessing now and to come, to this special relation which he has established with mankind to confess himself indebted for all: on this to hang all his hopes; and having his heart impressed with the Cross of Christ, his thoughts fixed in earnest contemplation of what his Saviour has said, done, and undergone, and thus imbued, as it were, with the baptism of his precious blood, to proceed to action.

It is evident, therefore, that the will of God is not to be sought by the Christian, merely among the natural relations of man to man. Those relations indeed still subsist; but they are all drawn by Christ towards himself, and acted upon by his influence. Besides their mutual motions, they have also another and general course assigned them. If they follow not this course, they are not within the system of Christianity. Every act of the Christian must have some reference to an act of Christ's, displayed by him in his sojourn upon earth, and destined to exert its influence upon him, as mystically affecting his spiritual station,—as directly operating by example,—as urgently prompting by command. Thus, is God's will that we should be gratefully disposed, to be sought in the mere shallow elements to which the moral philosopher would direct us? Or shall we not rather carry into our practice that deep and settled feeling to which human language cannot give a name, that which we imbibe through every pore of mind, from the contemplation of the character and office of the Son of God.

It is evident, also, from the above considerations, that, as to motive, the Christian cannot, dare not, look at everlasting happiness, without combining in the same view the Cross of Christ. As consistently may he expunge from his creed every article intervening between God the Father Almighty, and the life everlasting. No! that life he looks forward to, through a long and permanent chain of objects, every link of which has been designed to move both his heart and understanding; through his holy incarnation through his holy nativity and circumcision, through his baptism, fasting, and temptation, through his agony and bloody sweat, through his cross and passion, through his precious death and burial, through his glorious resurrection and ascension, and through the coming of the Holy Ghost. This is his perspective, down this long alley of glorious and heart-stirring facts, he contemplates the life to come; and through this only, as a Christian that hopes for salvation, dares he look forward to everlasting happiness.

On a basis so widely different from that proposed by the moral philosopher, rest the duties of the Christian, even where the former has borrowed the grand doctrine of eternal life!

It may seem necessary to illustrate this bearing of the doctrine of Christ crucified, upon our practice, by a comparison of passages from the philosopher and from Scripture, enforcing the same precept. We are, however, enabled to enter upon a parallel still more convincing and striking.

It is obvious that in the New Testament the rule of life, although throughout essentially the same, yet must differ exceedingly in clearness of object, distinctness of motive, and extent of application: so that it will contain two modes of practice. One of these will be that which guided the true Israelite, and therefore also our Lord's followers, before the Gospel dispensation was completed by the descent of the Holy Ghost, which put the crown to the Redeemer's glorious work in behalf of man. Another will be that by which his followers were influenced afterwards, as members of this new covenant now perfected. Accordingly the former will be found to prevail in the Gospels, the latter in the Epistles. The former, of course (from the generality which its comparative indistinctness induces), will be purely ethical; while the latter (from the individuality impressed by its clearness) will appeal to feelings and to facts. This distinction, obvious as it is, has not been sufficiently attended to, and its neglect has led to much laxity of opinion. For many persons, and more especially the moral philosophers, to whose views upon their subject it was very suitable, have, naturally enough, though very inconsiderately, fixed upon that great concentrated body of moral instruction, contained in our Lord's sermon on the mount; and conceiving that passage, as coming from his own lips, to contain (if any can) the Christian doctrine, have been led to regard the Gospel too much in the light of a system of ethics. So striking is the difference, that some infidels (not caring to ascertain the real state of the case) have not scrupled to assert that Christianity, as it came from its Author's mouth, was a mere moral system, and that this was corrupted immediately after his death by his apostles, more particularly by St. Paul. The comparison of a very few passages will be sufficient for our purpose.

In his sermon on the mount, our Saviour says, "Forgive, and ye shall be forgiven," (Luke vi. 37). Here is a moral precept, appealing indeed to the revealed doctrine of God's forgiveness, and deriving its obligation from the promise of this, and from the authority of its deliverer, as being sent from God. But let us seek for this same precept in the Epistles. There St. Paul bids the Colossians to "put on bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; forbearing one another, forgiving one another, if any one have a quarrel against any: even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye." (Coloss. iii. 13). Here all is grounded upon Christ crucified. His cross is the rule, the motive, and the obligation. Again, in the same sermon, our Lord thus lays down the duty of charity: "Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee, turn not thou away." (Matt. v. 42). Here is a moral precept, enforced as before. Let us also again turn to the Epistles. In urging the Corinthians to contribute to the necessities of the saints, St. Paul thus lays down the grounds of their duty: "for ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich." (2 Cor. viii. 9). Again we are referred to Christ crucified. Let one more example suffice. Our Lord, enforcing the duty of humility upon his disciples, says, "Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." (Luke xiv. 11). But how does his apostle, he who gloried in nought save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world was crucified unto him, and he unto the world,—how does this his faithful soldier and servant exhort to the same duty? He thus charges the Philippians: "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of man. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient even unto death, even the death of the Cross. Wherefore God hath also highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow—of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." (Philipp. ii. 7, &c.). Never before was such an appeal made to the heart of man. It stirs it with the thrilling strain of the trumpet. The humble man is raised from the dust, and set amidst angels. To what beggarly elements, to what wretched offscourings do we return, upon resuming the principles of the moralists. We seem hurled down from heaven to earth.

Thus we find in Scripture a moral system, based upon revelation, and not concocted by human reason; confirmed by our Lord himself, addressed to believers in repentance, in a redemption, in a life to come,—we find this in the very same volume (owing to the peculiarity of the circumstances), practically superseded by one, which rests upon the fact and doctrine of Christ crucified. What then shall we think, not only of the pretension, not only of the inutility, but of the mischievous and anti-christian tendency of those systems which we have been discussing? To the logician they are contemptible: to the Christian they are abominable.*

* I heartily wish that our University, which, according to her solemn prayer, sets so much value on sound learning and religious education, would consider how much she promotes either one or the other, by employing Paley's Moral Philosophy as a book of education.

We have now traced the peculiar bearing of this grand fundamental doctrine upon our moral duties, both as presenting a rule of life, and as supplying a motive of obligation. In effecting these objects, however, it accomplishes a third, in which it is quite singular. It at the same time furnishes an example,—an example, too, of a most peculiar influence. In the case of every thing which admits of degrees, our imagination can always go on to portray something of higher excellence still, until at length we obtain and fix in the mind's eye, an ideal model of perfection. It is the constant contemplation of this model which leads us from one stage of improvement to another, and ever with our advance advances also; always at our head, beyond our grasp, and unattainable. In this lies the source of all excellence: the poet and the painter, for instance, work after a model thus conceived in their own bosoms, but never to be realized by their lips or their hand; and therefore often regard their own production with a sigh, while it excites the admiration of surrounding crowds. In the same way we can form in our minds a model of moral excellence, unattainable by imperfect human nature; and some writers have drawn fictitious characters to embody their notions, and supply to coarser and less tutored minds, that spur to virtuous emulation, which they themselves find within their own bosoms. But, after all, the real effect produced is slight. Men turn away from the impalpable, unpractical model, listless, wearied, and incredulous. Now the system which rests upon Christ crucified, is not only a system of precept and doctrine, but also an aggregate of facts; and we are presented in our Lord, as man, with a real substantial being, the model of all excellence; one which surpasses every thing which our bosoms could have framed in their highest aspirations. Great indeed is the advantage of an example. We are in morals, after all, but little children: we are too careless to enter into long detail,—too ignorant to sum it up, and gather all its bearings. We require, therefore, a sensible picture, which shall present at one glance what must otherwise be conveyed in long and minute description. Thus we can inform ourselves at once upon the very brink of action into which we are so continually hurried, with but a few moments to spend upon preparatory reflection. Still even this is but a limited and most inadequate view of the benefits of Christ's example;—it were thus like the glorious firmament on high, to which, however we may gaze upon it, we can never make any sensible approach. But the facts which gave us this example, gave us also our redemption; they procured for us grace to do, as well as showed what we ought to do; they advanced us to a point whither of ourselves we could never have arrived, and which being unattained, the excellence of that example cannot be understood: vain had been the example of his patience, gentleness, meekness, charity, if the sufferings which called it forth had but operated thus passively, and not actively by God's will affected our souls. Taken in this twofold view, how inestimably precious is his example; how does it try and search our hearts; how does it stir our affections, while at the same time it enlightens our understanding, and chastens and exalts our imagination. But see still farther the wonderful goodness of God. He has not left us to the promise of grace to enable us to follow up this example, but hath poured it out so as to exemplify in men like ourselves its efficacy: besides the great example of our Lord moving like a sun through the region of Scripture, we are presented in the train of his followers with innumerable lesser lights, borrowing from him, and reflecting to us. All these are attainable, and they are manifest proofs to us of the fulfilment of God's gracious promises in the restoration of our fallen nature: there we see the weakness of the flesh converted into the strength of the Spirit; there we see exemplified the conquering might of Christ crucified; thence we can joyfully gather how the perfect new man may hereafter grow out of our sinful nature; these are our ancestors in the church of Christ: to their pictures we may look up; with the memory of their deeds nourish our courage; and, by imitating them, prove ourselves worthy descendants of the spiritual conquerors of the world. One point remains upon which it is necessary to bestow a brief notice, inasmuch as it supplies the ground upon which the authors of the modern moral philosophy have advanced the utility of their systems, and contended that Scripture does not dispense with them.

It has often been remarked, and by some objected, that Scripture, considered as a rule of life, omits some important duties,—as, for example, friendship and love of country. The objection is much more apparent than real, and goes, in effect, no farther than to say, that these abstract terms do not occur there. We may, with nearly as good reason, blame the highly national Greek, or the staunch Roman, because they have no single abstract term perfectly expressing our word patriotism. Scripture, as teaching, not on professed system, but indirectly, by means of facts, and expressions called forth by facts, is, on that account, no great dealer in abstract terms. But let the above terms be resolved into their elements, (and our practice must always so resolve them,) and every part is immediately met by Scripture. Thus, with regard to what is implied in the duty of friendship, is there no command to be kindly affectionate to one another, in honour preferring one another; none to bear with one another; none to rejoice with them that do rejoice, and to weep with them that do weep? has our Saviour left no such act on record, among those which marked his earthly sojourn; does his intercourse with Lazarus supply no example; and are there few elements of this duty to be derived by him who is engaged in the daily contemplation of the Son of God, offering himself upon the Cross for his redemption? The fact is, that Scripture inculcates a far deeper, a much more holy and permanent feeling than such as is implied in friendship, which is included as the less in the greater, and it sums all up in a single term, unknown (in this sense) in moral systems, brotherly-love (Philadelphia.) It has been said also, and truly said, that Scripture sometimes attaches blessings or curses to duties or offences which it has never defined: that covenant-breakers, for instance, are denounced, but the nature of a covenant not explained. This is the very strongest example that could have been chosen; a word of more awful import does not occur in Scripture; it states the most affecting relation in which man stands to God, it raises up immediately before his mind a series of the grandest and most moving events which have occurred upon earth. Scripture, in fact, presupposes a state of society in which such duties are necessary, and such terms current. But since their common acceptation in society may seem too undefined for all cases of application, to what source shall we refer for their strict definition. We must evidently have recourse to the light of nature, which Scripture presupposes; and not, by betaking ourselves to a mixture of the light of nature with that of the Gospel, commit Scripture in the absurdity of presupposing its own revelation.

Practically speaking, there will be little necessity even for this. In practice, men are seldom curious to investigate the bounds of duty except with a lurking notion of transgressing them: when they anxiously discuss the limits of obedience, they are on the borders of rebellion; when of patriotism, on the brink of treason; when of friendship, on the verge of treachery.

Thus it has been endeavoured to show the nature of the doctrine of Christ crucified, as bearing upon those duties, which the moralists assume as their province. In the course of this investigation, there has surely appeared no inclination to undervalue and decry the usefulness of moral philosophy: so far from it, that an acquaintance with the study, as based upon the mere light of nature, has been expressly stated at the outset to be essential to the character of the Christian scholar,—of the well appointed defender of his faith. But to those systems, which, by borrowing a truth, and not the whole truth, from revelation, obscure the light of nature, at the same time that they stain the purity of the Gospel, to them it is freely confessed that an equal deference has not been paid. Nor can he who addresses you sufficiently express, even in the most earnest terms of deprecation, his full sense and dread of their baneful effects. Alas! what they are too well calculated to produce, requires no additional encouragement. By the corrupt infirmities of our nature, we are already but too well disposed to dwell slightly upon the great doctrine of Christ crucified, to have recourse to any other base than this for a rule of life, and, like the wilful leper, to prefer Abanah and Pharphar to all the waters of Israel. From long habit, also, and careless enjoyment, we are disposed to mistake an indulgence for a right, and thus to deem of revealed doctrines,—such as the life everlasting,—as primary inherent principles in our nature. Add to this general tendency, vices, which impel many men on such a forgetfulness of our Saviour's Cross, weaknesses which incline almost all. Our indolence is gratified by thinking to rest upon this one single fact of a future state, without being compelled to go through the long and awakening detail by which Scripture conducts us: our vanity looks complacently at the dignity of future glory, but turns away from the humiliating rebuke of the atonement: our love of the enjoyment gazes with delight on the prospect of the happiness to come, but shrinks from the energy, the self-denial and mortification, held forth from the Cross of Christ. Thus all our corrupt nature tends with the whole of its bias this way; and shall education be called in to confirm it?

O let us not err ourselves, nor lead others into error: to the Christian the life to come is no abstract idea, which can be bandied about in heartless selfish calculation; it is a crowd of ideas, awful and vast, bidding defiance to the management of the puny mind of man. It is no single, detached fact, which will happen, against which we are to provide: it is one of a series, the far greater part of which has happened, and is affecting us at this moment. It is no simple element which may amuse the head: it combines a throng of emotions to stir the heart. Its contemplation cannot be taken up by any one at his pleasure; habitual earnestness alone has this privilege: and when taken up it requires effort to maintain as we should. For it requires to be maintained by studious reading of God's word; by frequent meditation on the intervention between God and man there detailed; and by continual prayer,—that searcher of the spirit, and opener of the heart.

Nothing is so dangerous as to render this doctrine familiar to the mind, divested of its Gospel accompaniments; and the Christian who has once brought himself to hold it steadily in view without including Christ crucified, has in that moment virtually denied the Lord who bought him, reckoned his blood common blood, crucified Christ afresh. Let the cold calculator be told that it is Christ crucified which alone enables him or gives him any right to look onward to the reward of another life: it is this alone (and not human precept) which can sustain his feet in this world, amid the shock of daily conflict; and to this alone (and to no help of human reason) when wounded by the great adversary, can he look up, as to its brazen type of old, and be healed. Here alone lie all his means of grace; here alone are seated all his hopes of glory. A celebrated father * of the church, in remarking on the accomplishment of these words of the prophet, "and his rest shall be glorious," says, in his fanciful manner, "the very form of his death is more glorious than a diadem. Therefore kings, putting off the diadem, take up the Cross, the symbol of his death: on the purple the Cross, on diadems the Cross, in prayers the Cross, on arms the Cross, on the holy table the Cross, and in every quarter of the world the Cross shines more glorious than the sun." What in his days was fast quitting the heart, and taking its place among the baubles of outside show, degenerating into the sign of a wretched superstition, let us, in accordance with purer times, resume spiritually in our bosoms. When we rise, the Cross: when we lie down, the Cross: in our thoughts, the Cross: in our studies, the Cross: in our conversation, the Cross: everywhere, and at every time, the Cross, shining more glorious than the sun. Yea! Let this, in our warfare below, become our sign, and in this we shall conquer.

DISSERTATION XV.

ON THE COMPARATIVE OPPORTUNITIES OF THE EARLIER AND LATER CHURCH.

See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil.—Ephes. v. 15, 16.

THE literal sense of the phrase "redeeming the time," in this passage, and in one parallel in the parallel Epistle to the Colossians, has been variously interpreted. It is quite sufficient for the present purpose to gather the general import of the text, which appears to be, that the Ephesians should direct their course of life with all wisdom and discernment, full of the knowledge of the will of God, so as to be enabled to distinguish the opportunities which he presents, and to turn them to proper account, accompanied and confused as they are with the numerous impediments to godliness, created by evil times.

That the days are evil, has been the warning cry of every period of the church until now, no less under Christian than under Heathen governments: for to every period has been assigned some peculiar trial of the godliness of its members. It has sometimes been sounded forth in notes of encouragement to resist; sometimes in the voice of most earnest deprecation to forbear; according as it has at one time appeared in the shape of violent persecution, as it did to the Ephesians, and the rest of the primitive church, or, at another, assumed the less repulsive but not less dangerous form of imposing prosperity. This cry may be louder at different times; but yet, as Christ has promised to his church to be with it to the end of the world, as he has promised to every two or three met together to be in the midst of them, as he has promised to each individual a sufficiency of grace, and that he shall not be tempted beyond what he can bear, but that a way to escape shall be made for him; it must be concluded, that any peculiar disadvantage under which this or that period may seem to labour, is balanced also by some peculiar advantage, and that none has occasion for superior boast or complaint. However unequal the ways of man, the ways of God are equal.

It is now proposed to examine this point by taking two extreme periods, the earlier and later times of the Christian church. Such a comparison must, if any thing can, be decisive of the question, since two periods could not be selected, more contrasted. They are as opposite as nearness and distance,—as danger and security,—as wonders and commonplace.

The first thing which strikes the inquirer on approaching this investigation, is the apparently unqualified superiority of the earlier period, shown in its possession of miraculous powers; and at these a wistful eye is often cast by persons who, not having taken due pains to lay a sure ground of faith, are troubled with difficulties and fits of scepticism, and cry out for signs and wonders, that they might believe: and again, by those also who, disheartened at their own want of energy, finding it so far below the point to which they are conscious it should attain, wish for the supernatural spur which operated upon the minds of the early Christians.

A nearer inspection will reduce this superiority to the level of our own times. For with regard to the exhibition of miracles, so much coveted, it ought to be borne in mind that they acted no farther, in the first instance, than as challenges of the attention of the witness to the doctrine promulgated by the worker. That doctrine was still to be investigated, for the miracle may proceed from a good or evil source (Matt. xii. 24), and therefore it was that the Bereans, in the most fruitful period of these extraordinary interpositions of divine power, when the wondrous works of the apostles were sounding in their ears, and displaying before their eyes, tried the spirits whether they were of God; searching the Scriptures daily, to see whether these things were so. The question, therefore, is reduced to this,—1. Is there now an equally importunate challenge? 2. Are there equal means of investigation?

1. The first question is quickly resolved.

When a miracle was exhibited before the eyes of the ancient heathen, it by no means necessarily roused his attention to a proper pitch of curiosity. Prejudice was active, subterfuges had been invented, and he could stifle all tendency to further investigation, by ascribing it to magic, or the powers ordinarily claimed by the wonder-workers of the day. To behold and to proceed in inquiry, demanded sincerity of heart, unconquerable love of truth, a fortitude to abide the consequences of conviction, which were by no means doubtful or desirable. Hence even of the beholders the number of converts was comparatively small, and were of that little band (how little, alas! in every stage of society,) who dared to see with their own eyes, and act upon the dictates of their own breasts.

But it was not to every convert that a miracle was exhibited; and where there was a single link of evidence interposed, the above indisposing causes would operate with tenfold influence. The interval was equivalent to the whole series of evidence interposed between those days and ours; and if he did not follow up immediately the call upon his attention, all trace was soon lost: the Christian was met but here and there, came and went, and was quickly lost sight of amid the predominance of the Pagan world. On the contrary, the unbeliever of these days must divest himself of first-instilled principles, and absolutely make his escape from society, yea, even from the face of inanimate nature, studded as it is with monuments of Christianity, if he would avoid the incessant solicitation of the Gospel of Christ. Assuredly it would be ridiculous for the modern even to hint at any disadvantage here.

2. With regard to the means of research, the modern may murmur at the nearness of source to the ancients,—at its distance from himself: may complain that he has to trace up a long course of evidence, extending through many ages: that while he dips his scoop in the stream, he has not in immediate sight the cleaving arm and the yawning rock to assure him of its miraculous source. How justifiable such a complaint may be, will appear from a very brief parallel of their respective means of evidence, and motives to enter faithfully upon it. To the one is presented the Church of Christ, young, insignificant, and scattered; but concentrated, with surpassing power, upon every point, however detached, by its possession of miraculous powers: to the other, the church established for ages, universally diffused, strong in connexion with the bonds of society, but gifted only with the ordinary powers of the spirit. To the one, the records of faith, not always at hand to peruse, not always perhaps collected into one body, but cotemporary with his own days, or not long prior: to the other, every where at hand, gathered into one volume universally acknowledged, but of a date long prior to his own times. To the one, an acquaintance with a despised people and a barbarous literature: to the other, all that has been in association in his mind with good and admirable from his cradle. To the one a brief examination, with little leisure and much peril: to the other a long review, with ample leisure and unbounded security. With regard to motive, the one had every reason to desist, where the other had every reason to begin. Where the convert looked around for others to keep him in countenance, he saw them sprinkled here and there, the offscourings, scoff, and derision of the world; the food of the axe, the stake and the amphitheatre: while the other beholds all the civilized tribes of earth,—the wise and the good, princes and their people, challenging him to their example, and crying out unto him, in freedom and not in bonds, to be even such as they.

In reply to the more reasonable demand of the other, who covets the moral effect of the miracles of the early church in stirring up the energies to holy action, we may first assert, generally, that the ancient, not having been nursed up from his cradle in the faith, may reasonably expect a more powerful excitement, and that what was lost in time should be made up in intensity: we should also take into the account the overwhelming trials to which he was exposed. If, however, it be answered, as it may, that such trials have occurred in later periods without any corresponding supernatural help, then (to omit the remark, that the extraordinary gifts at that period bestowed, were not so much designed for the assistance of individuals, as necessary to the very existence of the church, and have accordingly been withdrawn, since it has ceased to be a scattered and helpless body,) we may confidently assert, that the desired moral effect still resides with the church, in its documents, the Holy Scriptures; to which, if a person diligently apply, and open his heart, he cannot but imbibe the effect, which is not the less abiding for not being communicated by immediate impulse. In fact, the distance at which he views the wondrous dealings of God in olden times, is compensated by their being presented, not detached, as they must have been to the spectator; but coming before his mind in one harmonious series, converging to one purpose, not to the benefit of this or that individual or particular church,—as they might have appeared when they took place,—but to the support and glory of the universal church; to the comfort and encouragement of its members throughout all lands and all ages, to the end of the world. O yes! even to us at the present day, if we but give our hearts and minds their due exercise in their most glorious province, and draw nigh with them and commune with Him, to whom a thousand years are as a day, and generations but a span long, the effect of those wondrous works comes down through ages undiminished. Even to us the dumb speaks, the withered arm glows with life, the leper drops his polluting scales,—the lame walk, the blind see, the dead arise.

To say nothing of individual experience, we have convincing proof of this from public and well-known facts, for in what instance have the modern martyrs fallen beneath the ancient? Their bodily sufferings could scarcely be less, their spiritual trial certainly more severe, as it was administered by false brethren, and not by avowed unbelievers. Mighty, indeed, is the power of the word of God, when read diligently and earnestly, as if it were the voice of our Saviour speaking to us, searching our thoughts, and rousing our affections; but it comes with incalculable force in the hour of trouble, which shuts out all help and comfort from without, and compels us to the only place of refuge, the throne of God, established in our own bosoms by long and unwearied edification of his Gospel.

Thus far with regard to the most obvious appearance of unequal distribution of advantages to the members of the earlier and later church. A less prominent, but certainly not less important, subject of comparison, is the nature of those daily and ordinary opportunities, which the Christian is to distinguish, and to separate from their accompanying impediments, and turn to the account of godliness.

Christ in his holy church has assigned to every one his proper station. All is ordained of him, even to the very door-keepers of his house, the lowest of his holy priesthood. And as he has openly appointed some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, with their respective spheres of duty; so has he also, not less really, though from the nature of the thing less visibly, determined the place and duties of all those for whose edification they were appointed: and most grievously will the layman mistake, if he thinks that all his thoughts and actions are to be less directed towards the honour and glory of the great head and glorious body to which he belongs, than the lives of those who occupy, as doctors in his church, a more definite place. If his exertions be from his station less conspicuous, they must not be less substantial; from every one God requires the whole of his services, which he must duly render, keeping watch with his eye by day, and his ear by night. From the moment that the Christian awakes each day, to that in which his Master kindly lays him down again, he is encountered by a perpetual throng of circumstances,—in which he must distinguish good from evil, extracting from them the opportunity which God presents, and surmounting the impediments with which it may be clogged. He must not think to despise the slightness of the occasion: were it, in his Lord's own words, but to give a cup of cold water, it must not be passed by. For it comes immediately from his hands, it is afforded as a means of stirring up, and calling out into practice the grace which is in him; of exercising his spiritual strength, of trying his discernment; and is the forerunner of another, which its omission will render more difficult, both of being distinguished and arrested. Unemployed it is irrevocable; misemployed it is pernicious. Such opportunities are too apt to be estimated by the effects which they produce around us; which may often be trifling, and not upon us, which can never be unimportant, oftener than we think, most momentous. Thus at every step and turn, the Christian has some call upon him to separate good from evil; to choose the one and eschew the other, diligently distinguishing the work of the Lord from the business of the world.

Applying these considerations to the case before us, it must be allowed that the state of prosperity and security, by which the present period of the church differs from the earlier, especially from that in which the apostle addressed the Ephesians, makes the discernment of God's opportunities more difficult. We are not mingled with the heathen side by side, the contrast of whose darkness would bring them before us in a stronger light; they are of the colour of all around,—lie hid in the multiplicity of similar shapes. It is Christian society all around us. At the same time, however, we are delivered from the dangerous infection of the heathen's example, which, while it threw some things forward in a stronger light, offered too convenient a shade for others. Again, not to dwell upon the unwillingness of exertion produced by such a state, prosperity mingles evil with good in so subtle an union, throws such an equalizing gloss on the face of things, and renders, also, by the compact condition of society which accompanies it, relations so complicated, that a steady and acute discernment is necessary to distinguish what is wholesome from what is unwholesome. Whereas in times of affliction, where society is broken up, those relations are narrow and simple; the opportunity to be arrested is of greater dimensions, comes in a pronounced and distinct form, set out in all the contrast of light and shade. But then it comes accompanied with circumstances of terror and dismay, sufficient to quell any heart which has not prepared itself to undergo the extreme of suffering. While in the other case, the person raises around him but a ring or two of waves of trouble upon the calm surface of society, and all is still as before. Besides, this latter has had more leisure to form and give an edge to his discernment; he has been all along used to the minute shades by which circumstances around him are distinguished, and the calm and security with which God hath blessed him, will indeed have been abused, if it shall not have been employed in maturing the faculties which he has given him, with a view to their improvement. Steadiness of view, patience of observation, and a quick discernment of minute differences, are the qualities which his state is required to produce. But supposing the opportunity equally discerned by each party, it may now be contended that it is not with us presented in company with those distinct and energetic motives to action, which enforced its application in earlier times. It is true that in our days of peace, society moves but sluggishly in answer to any impression. The effect, therefore, does not so immediately follow; there are certain stages in the operation, and hence also we have often a series of motives to go through, before we arrive at the final which determines. We are, moreover, naturally reluctant to disturb the calm surface around us by any unusual exertion. Whereas in the other case, the effect would more immediately follow, and society was already in derangement. But we have most ample compensation in this, that our declining of such opportunities is not so immediately fatal. There is a train of them, and in the space allowed us between the neglect of the first, and a fall from the faith, we may relieve ourselves by arresting another. But there was presented at once the dreadful final alternative—"Christ or no Christ,"—and the opportunity once passed, gave him over to a reprobate mind, accused him of apostacy, bade him curse God, and die. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, says (vi. 4), "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift; and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come; if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance, seeing that they crucify unto themselves the son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame." Any wilful sin was certain, in those days of persecution, to draw that of apostacy with it; the above passage, therefore, would excite no remark upon its uncompromising severity. Yet how alarming is its tone to the reader of the present day; conscious of wilful sin, how dreadful does he find his situation, and how disproportionate does he think the consequences to the offence: but how relieved he feels at once from all his terrors, when he has discovered it is the sin of apostacy which is thus terribly denounced; and how careful modern commentators are to assure him of this. We have in this fact a strong proof of the happiness of our lot in these later days.

We might proceed to a long extent in comparing the circumstances of the two periods; but sufficient perhaps has been already stated, and it may be enough to observe in brief, that then physical courage was rather called into action,—now moral: then danger was rather the object of dread,—now opinion: then man was combated rather face to face,—now he is entrapped by a net for the feet. The tempter then had more recourse to brute force,—now he insinuates. On these and similar points we should still find advantage and disadvantage equally distributed to the two periods, and that God's ways are equal; it is ours that are unequal.

We are not, therefore, in the least behind our predecessors in the church of Christ on this consideration: we have equal means with the Ephesians of redeeming the time, since the days are evil. And having ascertained the peculiar character of our times, let us become sensible to the imposing necessity of turning it to its proper account; of using the leisure and security which we are enjoying to the cultivation of the faculties with which God has blessed us; to bring them, in a time so favourable, to that degree of ripeness, that we may in every case distinguish the occasions presented by our master, of serving him to the honour and glory of his name. There are also not a few errors, peculiar to this our state, against which we have to guard; and one or two of these I shall now proceed to describe.

When alarmed at the uncontemplated result of any action, men are apt to fly for consolation to the consciousness of having done it with the best and purest intentions. Now this would be a reasonable resource for one who, as in the times of ancient persecution, lived from day to day with his life on the edge of the sword; who, in jeopardy every hour, had little time to balance consequences, and therefore trusted in God for supplying his deficiency of foresight, provided the feeling upon which he acted were right. But it will furnish no excuse for us of this our period. The great searcher of all hearts has for us another interrogation to put: "Has due advantage been taken of the leisure and security afforded in my church, to form that conscience aright? The volume containing my will has never been violently plucked out of your hands; so comparatively regular is the train of events, that scarcely one might not have been provided against by a mind zealous of obedience; your meditations have been unbroken from without. What excuse then can you plead for being taken by surprise at any moment, and being obliged to act blindfold upon the crude and hasty dictates of an uninformed conscience?" Let us anticipate in our own hearts this solemn interrogation, and judge ourselves, that we be not judged of the Lord.

If mere conscience (not considering whether it be informed or not, according to the means afforded), be sufficient to sanctify any act, how soon would the will of our master become a dead letter, since he that knows much, and he that knows little, may then do equally good service. How unnecessarily urgent would seem the apostle's injunction "to be vigilant, to be sober, to be understanding what the will of the Lord is." Why need we think of the advice, "to examine our ownselves, prove our ownselves, know our ownselves?" Why should we take heed to the warning of the prophet, who tells us that "the heart is deceitful above all things?" Why to the command "to make the best of the talents committed to our charge," of which the knowledge of God's will is the most precious, for he has not made us mere creatures of impulse? Assuredly the heart which has not been strictly trained up, and informed by diligent comparison with God's holy word and commandments,—which has not had its motives continually and jealously questioned, nor been checked here, spurned there, disciplined every where, will, when suddenly called forth, carry into action some interested motive, some unworthy affection, which the emergency of the moment allows it not leisure to sift and expel. When too late they make their appearance, overwhelm with shame and confusion, and discourage in future from the very best and safest undertakings.

If in this period we are called upon for a higher exertion of our faculties, we have also to guard more against that abuse of them, which, like the weed to the plant, is so apt to spring up with them, and choke or distort their growth. One of these, beyond all others, requires a constant curb from the sober and vigilant Christian; and the more so, perhaps, in proportion to the cultivation of his mind,—and that is the imagination. Beyond number, indeed, and beyond weight, are the evils to which its abuse may give birth: one only, however, concerns the subject now in hand.

In those early days of the church, to which so much reference has been made, the real and deeply contrasted events with which they were engaged, the numerous perils with which they were beset around, the frequent calls to come forward and do or suffer, utterly prevented them from attending to its delusions. But in a period of leisure and security, like ours, it is drawn upon to supply as it may that excitement, and administer to that novelty which is so natural to man. This it is which, above all, blinds the mind's sight to the occasions presented by the hand of God. They are not sufficiently striking, forsooth, they are associated with common-place, and the detail of ordinary life; they are tricked out in none of those brilliant colours with which it has invested the day of proof and trial; they are therefore carelessly passed by,—another comes, and still another, but neither is it yet the time. He reserves himself for a day of his own choosing, and not of God's offering; he looks forward in his carnal mind to some theatrical exhibition of his faith; and the future confessor, amid his lofty speculation, is overthrown and brought to the ground by the slightest and the most despised of daily incidents: for the value of any excitement of mind where this power alone is concerned,—for the reality of his zeal, his love, his faith, and all on which he builds, I would refer him to no unsubstantial vision, but an actual scene which shortly preceded the death of our blessed Lord. Of that immense crowd which, with waving boughs of palm, and loud hosannas, were conducting him through the streets of Jerusalem over their strewn garments, in triumph to his temple, how many, but a few days after, interfered to save him from the Cross? how many did not surround that Cross with mockings and revilings?

Shall the opportunity then set before his eyes, serve at best but as a key note to a strain of idle dreaming, and unprofitable speculation? Yet, to use the words of the lawgiver, it is not hidden from him, neither is it afar off: it is not in heaven nor beyond the sea, but it is nigh unto him that he may do it. O, never let the healthy activity of practice yield to a morbid habit of speculation; hurtful as the effects of such an exchange will be, they will not stop at mere neglect of opportunities, but go on to undermine the foundations of religious faith, which can continue pure in doctrine, and vital in practice, only by resolutely casting off all self-conceived notions; by bringing the imagination in strict subjection to the sober tenor of Scripture, by giving up the heart in all simplicity, and the mind in concentrated attention upon its facts and doctrines, and by seeking diligently every occasion to put the grace of God into practical effect.

When our blessed Saviour was anointed by Mary with a most costly unguent, a murmur was vented against her by the man who was on the point of betraying him, because she had not rather sold it, and distributed the money to the poor. Our Lord approved of Mary's act, he accepted it as the last pious office of a nearest and dearest friend, who had thus anointed his body for burial. By this approval, he has given us indeed a strong admonition how we should employ every occasion of showing towards him our entire devotion and love; for that occasion is offered by himself, in that he is peculiarly present. We are not to turn away, as his betrayer, and the tempter of that betrayer would persuade us, and shut up our heart; substituting for the lively reality a crowd of beings of neither time nor place, who can neither feel nor be felt for. Thus entering into a ruinous barter, by which we may think to make compensation for our neglect of God's work, by the greater good which we imagine ourselves to be pursuing, and proceeding in regular course from sins of omission to those of commission. What indeed were this but a mental idolatry, what but to turn from the face of the living God and address ourselves to the work of our own hands; rather let us pour upon him, now that he is with us, the whole treasure of our exertions, and fill the house of his presence with its perfume. Whatever the future may be, however brilliant, however important, let us remember that, by God's ordinance, the present is the only door to it; and if in our hasty presumption we leap over the wall, we alight without the fold of God, and not within it.

In that fold, in his holy and blessed church, we have been gathered by Christ, having been bought with a price, even with his own precious blood, and are his servants to do his will, and not to seek our own. We are to keep a vigilant look out for the opportunities peculiar to the several stations which he has assigned us; and these, if attended to, are sufficient to crowd our sphere of duty to fulness. In arrogating a wider range, we are assuming a power which he has not accorded us, and with a barren ambition overlooking what he has put legitimately into our grasp. There, in that calling in which he hath called us, is his presence-chamber; there is his holy place, in which only he will accept our offerings; there is the Zion of the living God, where if we be not found, we are bowing before the calves at Bethel. If our own experience happily has not taught us, let us learn from the warning voice of others, that if there be one circumstance which more than another embitters a retrospect, it is the view of unemployed opportunities: they have glided by perhaps with slight impression, and carelessly noticed; but, like those bowmen of old, are terrible when past, dealing behind them wounds of remorse and shame; then their despiser, in amazement, beholds the number which he has permitted to pass by, and sees them blocking up against him that point to which they were tending, and might have conducted him. And that is some blessing from which he now finds himself for ever excluded; some honourable sphere perhaps of usefulness, never now to be gained; some service in his Heavenly Master's house on earth, replete with heart-filling and exalted duties which is now unattainable: and finding that fortune, upon which he has been drawing like a thoughtless spendthrift, entirely empty of its treasures, sits down, bankrupt in hope, and bemoaning his folly in vain.

Can he complain that those opportunities came to him not sufficiently distinct for his apprehension? This is but to admit that he was deficient in vigilance. His Heavenly Master gave him ample notice of their passage, for all were accompanied with some change of body or mind, or the things without; with gain or with loss; with joy or with sorrow; with warning or with invitation, which might have awakened all but the determinedly reckless. And by their proper disposal he might have obtained the gift of still greater, and seen in their giver an unfailing author of good, to whom he could look up with confidence in the hour of need; an object of faithful though imperfect services, whom he could regard with the sure and certain hope of his reward; an indulgent and long-suffering Lord, who would often be content to take the will for the deed. But now, alas, the contrast! He sees in that giver a kind master neglected and disobeyed; a friend who had even given his life for him empty-handed and unrequited; a witness whose testimony shall reach his most secret and perverse ways; and a judge with whom there shall be no favour.

The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away. Oh! as he hath given us the light through his Holy Spirit, may he continue it unto us, nor may we by recklessness of life give him cause to take it away. May we thus be enabled with all discernment to redeem the time, with grace to order all our works to his honour and glory, and offer to him in our souls and our bodies a continual sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.

DISSERTATION XVI.

ON THE FORTUNES OF THE CHURCH.

And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh.—Luke, xxi. 28.

Through all varieties of climes, of tongues, of laws, of customs; through all alternations of barbarism and civilization; through all migrations of people, changes of empire, and confusion of the tribes of mankind; through all these impediments the Church of God has come down to us uninterrupted and triumphant, and uninterrupted and triumphant (our Saviour has informed us) it shall proceed to the end. But as in looking back upon its history we see it often engaged in a desperate conflict, sometimes brought even to death's door, so in looking forward we must expect to find a similar state of things, to see her still militant against the world, and the world still warring upon her; nor are we left to reasonable expectation alone. Our Lord and his apostles have assured us that such will be her condition, and have even shadowed forth in words of prophecy some of the most important trials which she is still destined to undergo.

Perhaps at no period of the world has the face of the Christian Church presented a more interesting appearance than at the present day. A long period of calm and security is past, and a period of most foreboding aspect is coming on. Superstition and infidelity, which combined their powers against her in her infancy, are once again in open league. Wherever we cast our eyes they are met with churches tottering, and creeds insulted. But it was amid the fearful signs which proclaimed and accompanied the overthrow of what had been a portion of God's Church, that our blessed Lord bade his disciples to look up, and lift up their heads, for that their redemption drew nigh. May not then the spiritual man derive a similar comfort from similar signs? Certain it is, that a careful reader of the history of the church will find, that the ruin of any portion of it has led to the extension of its dominion in other quarters, and with a purer creed. A connected series of events is readily traced between the lamentable fall of the eastern church, and the spread of the gospel over the western hemisphere. And, in every case, assured as we are of the duration of the body, we can regard the visitations, which afflict its individual members, as the operations of the master of the vineyard; who is lopping off dead branches, removing choking weeds and overshadowing shrubs, and pruning even his choicest vines; thus baring them to the fostering breath of his spirit, and to the ripening sun of his Gospel. So that here, even where we ourselves are sufferers, still may we look up, and rejoice that our redemption draweth nigh. Yea, even should our own particular vine be shorn to the ground; yet, as long as the root remains, we may comfort ourselves with confidently looking forward to its shortly putting forth its branches with redoubled vigour and fruitfulness. That, in the darkest and most perplexing times, we may quote these words of our Lord with joyful hope, will appear from considering that by a law, resulting from the very nature of the church, a period of affliction will usher in one of triumph.

The church is a society taken out from the slavery of the world, and brought together into the liberty of the Gospel. Did it, therefore, consist but of perfect members, it were removed beyond all influence of this world for good or for evil; the world would not have a single tie or hold upon them, but all being free in the spirit, would be unassailable by any chance or change affecting the flesh. But its members are all in different stages towards perfection, very many far remote from it. They are still liable, therefore, to the chains of the world, and the whole, as a body, subject to temporal accidents. The world reduces men into its slavery either by compulsion or by seduction; that is, by persecution or by temporal prosperity. These two modes we will briefly consider. No son of man can be so disengaged from the world as not severely to feel, however he may withstand, the power of persecution. Every man will join with the holy Zacharias in the expression, that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve our God without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life. For at such a time, not only is his outer man afflicted by constraint put upon his means of worship, by his constancy being every moment put to the proof by the threats of the sword of the magistrate, and sometimes tried almost to exhaustion by incessant watchfulness and resistance; but his inward man is grieved for the honour and glory of God before men. His holy church is shut up in a beleagured city; neither her armies nor ambassadors can go forth; her numbers are daily thinned by apostacy, her provisions are run short by the hindrance given to the word. Help us, he cries with the Psalmist, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name: O deliver us, and be merciful unto our sins, for thy name's sake. Wherefore do the heathen say, where is now their God. But no affliction, however severe, can be superior to the comfort which the church can administer, for that comfort was ordained to quell the very head of all affliction, the loss of bliss and innocence. And the church is then peculiarly in her vocation when her consolation is most needed; then all her treasures are opened and poured forth, and, as worldly sorrows deepen, her spiritual bounties become more prodigal, their measure ever keeping far in advance of the quantity of affliction which called them forth; to hunger, and nakedness, and the sword, she opposes the spiritual banquet of the knowledge of God in Jesus Christ, the robes of righteousness and everlasting glory, the life without end in the world to come. These glorious promises, which seemed afar off amid worldly security and enjoyment, are now brought close to the sufferer's eyes, and amid the most fearful signs he may look up, and lift up his head, for his redemption draweth nigh.

The church of God is too strong for the world; she is ever one and the same; her members are united by an unvarying, undying principle, which is faith in the redemption wrought in Christ Jesus. But worldly society is never in one stay, it has no abiding principle to keep it together, day by day it is changing manners, morals, and institutions. What wonder, then, if, with all its kingdoms, and principalities, and powers, it has been compelled to desist from its fierce attacks; if monarchies in ancient times, and republics in modern, have been unable to maintain the persecution which they had begun: the weakness of God has overcome the strength of man. It is at this moment, when persecution has but lately ceased, that the visible church is seen in all its beauty; the storm, however it might have ruffled her leaves, has refreshed her root, her main trunk shoots its branches anew, and she puts on double beauty for all her former uncomeliness. Her withered leaves, her rotten boughs, have been carried away by the violence of the tempest. Now she is reaping the reward of her sufferings; now is come the redemption to which she looked through the veil of her afflictions. But, after a brief interval, the world renews its attacks, and in a different manner; the high courage which she has shown, the splendid victory which she has gained, the stability which she has disclosed, draw the admiring gaze of men upon her, and gain attention to her doctrines; generous and candid minds are won over to her faith, every day she extends the curtains of her tent. But now that all is peace, now that she and the world are not openly and bodily at issue, the worldlings flock in, and with them the thoughts, the affections, and the passions of the world. The world now seduces her members into its slavery; and much more dangerous is this mode of its attack, inasmuch as the apostates which it makes do not go out from the church, and relieve the labouring vessel of a heavy and useless cargo, as in time of persecution; but remain within, where their false doctrine eateth as doth a canker: hence heresies, seditions, strife, with all their train of evil; society, civil and religious, is disturbed, and at length broken up; calamity regains its turn.

If we look at the state of the church throughout the civilized world, we cannot but be persuaded that it is close upon one of these critical alternations; the calm and smooth water is nearly passed through, and our ears can now distinctly hear the noise of the waves, and our eyes discern the foam of the breakers; distress of nations is coming on with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring: if ever there was a time which called for reflection and humiliation, it is the present. These may, immediately, through God's acceptance and blessing, and mediately through the moral effects, which by the laws of his governance they produce, work a salutary change, and soften, if not avert, the impending chastisement. Let us, therefore, take a brief review of the responsibility under which seasons of prosperity lay both nations and individuals, as component parts of the universal church of God.

One of the most grievous mistakes of the present day, and one which assuredly will reap tenfold retribution, is the supposition that it is unnecessary for a nation which is composed of members calling themselves Christians, to assume a positive Christian character: that, while every individual is bound, as a servant of Christ, to seek in all things the promotion of his honour and glory, yet their joint and concentrated efforts, which are the acts of government of the country, need have no reference whatever to this result: such a supposition either implies a contradiction, or something much worse. The very opposite to it is that which must present itself to a truly Christian mind. A nation of men which profess Christ, must also possess Christ, and with the same distinctness; it must openly show the sign of the cross; and vain are all its counsels which are not directed to the glory of God as their final object: the course of the affairs of this world ever has and ever will be directed by God towards the coming of his kingdom. This way tends the great stream of earthly events, and the counsels of a people, which follow this direction, can have no obstacle: they will be borne steadily along to a successful end. But such as go not with this stream, will shortly be dashed to pieces and overwhelmed by the strength of the current; the former will bring happiness and honour, and the latter will meet with defeat and shame. To seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, is no less the duty and policy of the nation than of each of its citizens; and demoralization, with its certain succession of intestine commotion, and foreign subjugation, is sooner or later the certain reward of every people which neglects this prime commandment of our Saviour.

But if we consider a nation of Christians not only with reference to its internal polity, and external communication with other nations of Christians, but also with reference to the heathen nations with which God's providence, preparing his kingdom, has brought it into contact, great indeed is its responsibility: so much the greater still on account of the very small number to whom he has granted such an opportunity of doing his service: a number so small, that it implies an election to the purpose, an ordination to the office. That nation has been made peculiarly his priesthood, to preach his word to the heathen; and if that nation be at the same time at the very summit of prosperity and civilization, then has God also entrusted to it, as to a preacher of his Gospel, powers of similar efficacy to that of miracles which he shed upon his early preachers; for the gift of working miracles was withdrawn, was in fact superseded, as soon as the church became a compact and influential body, so as to force its principles on the attention of the heathen. And when Christianity became the religion of the civilized world, so effectual a substitute was this civilization, that even the conquering barbarian heathen adopted the religion of the conquered Christian. By such an engine were all the modern nations of Europe converted; shall they then be excused if they neglect any opportunity of doing the same towards their fellow men, who still lie in darkness and the shadow of death? The engine which has been committed to the hands of our nation is more powerful still than this. For we appear among the heathen as conquerors. We have been furnished with the most forcible means of drawing their notice towards the Gospel of Christ. And if we take proper means to show them that to that Gospel we owe our superiority; if the Cross of Christ, every where displayed, inscribed on our banners, waving over our victorious palaces, proclaim that great is the Lord God of England; if our religion be seen marching with our hosts, like the tabernacle of God, among our captains, and not our camp followers, shining like the Urim and Thummim on the breasts of our counsellors and rulers; if it be embodied to their eyes in an organized, publicly acknowledged, and sufficiently numerous ministry, can the effects be calculated? Has God placed such means in the hands of any nation since the world began? The conquering empires, which he has hitherto employed to further his kingdom upon earth, have been brute unconscious agents, which knew no more of him, and of his counsels, than the saw or the axe does of the mind of him that handles and employs them. But our nation has had imparted to it the life of the Gospel,—has had revealed to it his gracious purpose of salvation, his will that the Gospel should be preached to every creature. By the peculiar position in which he has placed it, he has clearly intimated to it that it should "go teach all nations." May it so answer the call, that he may say also, "I am with thee to the end of the world." That this call has not been answered hitherto in any degree corresponding to its pointedness, to its urgency, to the gifts on which it presumes, must be confessed with shame and confusion of face; and in every national humiliation. Hither the heart of the true penitent for national sins will turn, and find the burthen of his song of lamentation: here he will find his chief cause of fearfulness and trembling. For he will reflect that God makes the adversity of nations to minister to his purposes, no less than their prosperity. The temporal loss of Israel was the spiritual gain of the world. He was broken in pieces like a potter's vessel, and his scattered sons were made God's preachers among the heathen, to prepare the way of the Prince of Peace. By a reverse operation God concentrated the barbarians upon the falling Roman empire, and thus brought them within the sound of his Gospel. Surely this is a most awful consideration to a nation so pre-eminently gifted by God for doing him service, as ours has been. Surely it is possible, it is but too probable, that if we have neglected to yield this service out of the abundance of our prosperity, then he will wring it out of the straightness of our adversity: if we have refused to be conscious agents, then he will turn us into unconscious tools of his purposes.

To all this, and anxiety with regard to the sentence which God may pronounce upon his nation, the individual has to add the fearful sense of his own responsibility. A sincere feeling of humiliation, a true knowledge of the principles of the Gospel, will remind the best of men, that, sinner as he is, he must have contributed a share to the national sinfulness, on which fearful visitation seems fast descending. Then, as one who sees his own sin, not only in himself, but confronting him by reflection also from others, he begins the work of examination and self-rebuke. Then it is that a dreary list of sins of omission and commission is presented to the perusal of his mind. He then sees opportunities, which he, in common with his countrymen, had received, and in common with them had neglected. Then he perceives how different might have been the face presented by the Church of Christ, had all employed them. And then it is that the approaching period of darkness and constraint discovers to him, by its appalling contrast, how inadequately he has put to account the hours of calm and leisure, which have hitherto been his blessed portion; how much opportunity he had of preparing his spirit for the conflict, by the study and practice of God's word; of weaning affections, which must now be rudely torn from the breast; of conquering, step by step, the stripling power of the world, which now, grown suddenly to a giant's might, demands of him to decide the struggle, once for all, at one combat. All these reflections rise up before his mind, and accuse him before the throne of God; and mournfully he remembers his Master's warning to "watch, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh." He will prostrate himself with all contrition and confusion of face, and implore forgiveness. There is none that doeth good, no, not one, will be the confession of the true penitent, on a day of national humiliation. But having thus explored his heart, and opened it before God, he will, with God's grace, gird up his loins, put on the whole armour of light, and prepare to meet his trial with a fixed resolution and unperplexed conscience. And then, when the fearful signs begin to take place, when wars and commotions shall be heard, when nations and kingdoms shall be shaken; when there shall be distress of nations, and failing of men's hearts for fear; when the abomination of desolation shall be standing in the holy place,—he will look up and lift up his head, for his redemption is at hand, the kingdom of God draweth nigh. Sorrow may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. The storm is ushering in a glorious day, and between its gusts he can overhear the tinkling of the trowel of the angelic masons rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. If his body perish in the storm, then hath the kingdom of heaven arrived to him indeed; he has obtained his everlasting rest and citizenship there. If it survive, then are his eyes blessed with the sight of the purified church of God, shining like gold from the furnace. The vineyard of the Lord lies before him, expanded in more than its former loveliness. The unsightly and noxious weeds have been removed, its hedge has been repaired, its wine-press, its lake, and tutelary shed, have been replaced anew. Therefore, whichever lot betide him, he will look up, lift up his head, for his redemption draweth nigh.

OF

FOR PROPAGATING THE GOSPEL AMONG THE HEATHEN,

FROM THEIR COMMENCEMENT TO THE YEAR 1817.

BY THE REV. JOHN HOLMES,

AUTHOR OF THE HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN.

INTRODUCTION.

The declaration of our blessed Saviour, the kingdom of God cometh not with observation; may with great propriety be applied to the Missions of the United Brethren. Their attempts to impart to the heathen the knowledge of God and of salvation, commenced in a manner so obscure and unostentatious, as generally to elude the notice of all, but their own immediate connexions and particular friends; and they had exerted themselves, for several years, in this labour of love, before the attention of their fellow-Christians, in other denominations, was attracted to this great object. But while the world at large, either remained totally ignorant of these exertions, or treated the scheme with silent contempt or open ridicule, the Brethren, unappalled by contempt and calumny, and a thousand difficulties, which impeded their progress, pursued with unabating zeal what to them appeared the path of duty. The love of Christ constrained them to obey his command: Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature, and the gracious promises of his holy word animated them in their arduous work.

The origin of their missions was attended with circumstances singularly interesting. Count Zinzendorf[*] being gone to Copenhagen, in the year 1731, to be present at the coronation of Christian VI., king of Denmark, some of his domestics became acquainted with a Negro, called Anthony. This man told them much of the miseries endured by the Negro slaves in the island of St. Thomas, and of the ardent desire of many, especially of his sister, to be instructed in the way of salvation. This relation deeply affected the count, and served to revive the hope, expressed by him some years before at a public meeting in Herrnhut, that the Brethren would one day have it in their power to proclaim the gospel to the Laplanders, Negroes, and Greenlanders. On his return, therefore, he took an early opportunity of mentioning this occurrence to the congregation.

Anthony, having soon after obtained leave from his master to visit Herrnhut, repeated his former relation to many of the inhabitants; but added, that the labours of the Negroes were so incessant, that they could find no leisure for religious instruction, unless their teacher himself became a slave, for the purpose of instructing them during their daily employment.

This representation roused the zeal of the Brethren for the conversion of the heathen, and they determined that no obstacle, however apparently insurmountable, should deter them from making the attempt. Two young men, in particular, Leonard Dober and Tobias Leupold, were so deeply impressed with the magnitude of the object, that they publicly avowed their resolution to go to St. Thomas, and even TO SELL THEMSELVES AS SLAVES, in order that they might have an opportunity of preaching the gospel to the Negroes, should they find no other way of accomplishing their purpose. Tobias Leupold repeated his request for permission to go to St. Thomas, in writing, and while his letter was read to the congregation, the brethren, Matthew Stach and Frederic Boenish formed the resolution of offering themselves to go to Greenland.[*]

A sacred impulse to missionary labours was thus imparted to the congregation at Herrnhut by the great Head of his universal church, who, in the unerring counsels of his wisdom and love, designed the

[*] This pious young nobleman was the instrument employed by God for preserving the small remnant of the ancient church of the Brethren, and renewing its constitution and discipline, at the beginning of the eighteenth century. In consequence of dreadful persecutions, stirred up against them by the papists, the Brethren's congregations in Moravia, [upwards of 200 in number,] were totally destroyed, their ministers, together with many noblemen and private individuals of their church, put to death, or exiled, and their bibles and other religious books burnt. Those few who survived the persecution, and faithfully adhered to their principles, were forced to conceal themselves in cellars and other obscure places, in the caves of rocks, and the almost impervious thickets of the forests, where they held their religious meetings in private, and chiefly in the night, for fear of their enemies. Being informed that there was greater liberty of conscience in Saxony and Silesia, many sought an asylum in those countries. Some of these emigrants arrived in 1722 at Bertholsdorf, in Upper Lusatia, an estate belonging to Count Zinzendorf, who, when he had learned the cause of their emigration, received them in the kindest manner, and encouraged and assisted them in forming a colony on a neighbouring hill, called Hutberg. This colony afterwards received the name of HERRNHUT, and became the first congregation of the renewed church of the Brethren.—See Holmes's History of the Brethren's Church, Vol. I. p. 165, &c.

[*] Hist. of B. Church, Vol. I. p. 215, &c.

Brethren to become the honoured instruments of publishing the saving name of Jesus to many savage tribes, and of sowing the gospel-seed on soils the most barren and unpromising. The impulse, thus granted, operated most powerfully, for though the colony at Herrnhut, at the time of commencing this great work, consisted of only six hundred persons, and these mostly poor exiles; yet neither their external poverty, nor the smallness of their number, could damp their zeal, or relax their ardour. Having given themselves unto the Lord, they were disposed to offer to him also all they possessed, fully persuaded that it is nothing with the Lord, whether to help with many, or with them that have no power, and that with his blessing on their exertions, a little one would become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation.

Supported by this conviction they cheerfully encountered every difficulty, and endured the severest hardships in distant countries and among barbarous tribes, with a spirit of self-denial, patience, and fortitude, which clearly manifested that they were willing even to hazard their lives for the name of the Lord Jesus.

Within the short period of ten years missionaries went to St. Thomas, to St. Croix, to Greenland, to Surinam, to the Rio de Berbice, to several Indian tribes in North America, to the Negroes in South Carolina, to Lapland, to Tartary, to Algiers, to Guinea, to the Cape of Good Hope, and to Ceylon: and since that time missionaries have been sent to the islands of St. Jan, Jamaica, Antigua, Barbadoes, St. Kitts, and Tobago, in the West Indies; to Paramaribo, and other places in South America; to Persia, to Egypt, to Labrador, to Tranquebar, and the Nicobar Islands.

In several of these places their attempts have proved unsuccessful. In some instances, the missionaries sent out never reached the place of their destination; in others, the political state of the country to which they went, rendered their immediate return an imperious duty; and in one or two cases they were compelled to relinquish their benevolent design, after years of patient perseverance and heroic fortitude, spent in fruitless endeavours to impress the wretched natives with the importance of the gospel.

These partial failures, however, did not paralize their exertions; for while the want of success, in some cases, had a tendency to humble and preserve them from vain glory in their own strength, the divine blessing, which attended their labours, in other places, quickened their diligence, maintained their confidence in the Lord, and disposed them to ascribe all the glory unto Him. And the experience of nearly a hundred years, during which they have been engaged in this noble work, has furnished them with abundant proofs that the cause is the Lord's, and that he is able to carry it on even by the weakest instruments. To Him they desire to express their warmest gratitude for the present flourishing state of most of their missions, where the word of God is evidently glorified in turning the Gentiles from darkness into light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

CHAPTER I.

MISSION IN GREENLAND.

Greenland is the remotest tract of land in the north, lying between Europe and America, and is divided into east and west Greenland. The eastern coast is wholly inaccessible, but the western coast has been known to Europeans for above two hundred years, though no colonies were formed there till within the last century, when the Danes erected several factories for the purpose of carrying on the whale-fishery.

The western coast, as far as it has been explored and occupied by the Danes, extends from the 59th to the 73d degree of north latitude. It is very thinly peopled, the number of inhabitants probably not exceeding seven thousand. The whole coast is surrounded with steep and lofty cliffs, the summits of which are covered with perennial snow and ice, intersected by many bays and defended by innumerable larger and smaller islands. In some of the latter, and also in the valleys on the main land, there is a little vegetation, consisting of grass, a few hardy flowers, various kinds of berry-bearing shrubs and low brush-wood, but in general the soil is barren and unproductive.

The want of large timber is in some measure compensated by the drift-wood, which floats in great quantities into the bays and islands, and serves the Europeans for fuel, and the natives for building their houses, tents, and boats.

The climate in this country is intensely cold, sometimes so severe that beer and even brandy freeze in a room heated by a stove; but the air is generally pure and serene, and bracing to European constitutions. The bays and the water between the islands are seldom frozen for any length of time, and in some winters they remain open the whole season. This is of great advantage to the Greenlanders, as their principal subsistence is derived from fishing. In very severe winters, therefore, they mostly experience a famine. The summer seldom lasts above four months, and even then it frequently snows, and the frost never leaves the ground entirely, as the rays of the sun seldom penetrate above a foot below the surface. Yet the heat in summer is as great as in any part of England or Germany. In summer there is scarce any night, as the sun does not remain above two or three hours below the horizon, and from the tops of the mountains his beams are reflected even at midnight, so that a person, seated in a room, may read and write without the aid of a candle. And though the winter nights are proportionally long, yet the darkness is considerably lessened by the stronger light of the moon, the prevalence of the aurora borealis, (or northern lights,) and by reflections from the ice and snow.

The natives are of a tawny hue and low stature, with very dark and black eyes, and long flowing hair. They are clad the whole year round in fur dresses, made of the skins of seals and reindeer, very neatly sewed by the women. Their dwellings are of two kinds; first, tents, which are covered with seal-skins, and constitute their summer habitations; secondly, winter houses constructed of large stones, the walls being a yard in thickness, and the crevices filled up with earth and sods. The roof is made with a few uprights, cross-beams, and laths, every opening being stopped up with heath. Over this are spread sods and earth, and the whole covered with old skins. The inside breadth of such a house is generally twelve feet, but its length varies from twenty-four to seventy-two feet, according to the number of its inmates. The ceiling is so low that it barely admits of a man standing upright in it. The entrance is by a long, low passage, through which you must rather creep than walk; but this is well calculated to keep out the cold. Four, or even ten families live together in a house, each having its own apartments, separated from the rest by a screen made of skins. In every apartment a lamp is kept constantly burning, which lights and heats it, and serves the purposes of cooking their victuals. Great cleanliness must not be looked for in their houses; and the constant smell of the train-oil is very disagreeable to Europeans. Yet, the contentment of the Greenlanders, amidst this poverty, and the order and stillness observed among them, where so many dwell together, cannot but excite admiration.

They have two sorts of boats; the one called woman's or skin-boat, and the other kajak. The latter is eighteen feet long, terminating in a point at each end. In the middle it is eighteen inches broad, and but one foot in depth. It is covered on all sides, above and below, with seal-skins, leaving an aperture in the middle, in which the Greenlander seats himself, lacing the skin of the boat so tightly round his waist, that no water can penetrate. Such is their dexterity in managing the kajak, that, if it even upset, they can right it again by a single stroke of the paddle, which they use for rowing. In this manner they scud over the waves, even in tempestuous weather, with astonishing celerity, and not unfrequently make a voyage of twenty leagues in a day. Seated in his kajak, equipped with his bow and arrow, his harpoon and other implements for catching seals, the Greenlander feels not a little proud of his skill, and looks down upon the arts of Europeans with supercilious contempt.

The skin-boat is much larger, being from forty to fifty feet long, and proportionally broad and deep. The skeleton is made of thin laths, tightly fixed together, and covered with soft leather of seal-skins, so that no water can penetrate. It is entirely managed and rowed by women, and capable of containing ten or twelve persons, together with their luggage and provisions. In these boats the natives travel from one place to another, and often perform voyages of several hundred leagues. The skeletons both of the skin-boat and the kajak are constructed by the men, but the covering of them is the work of the women. The women likewise have the management of all domestic concerns, and very early accustom their daughters to industry. The men and boys spend most of their time in acquiring the art of managing the kajak and catching seals, which exposes them to frequent dangers and many perils at sea.

Nothing like a regular government, or organized system of laws, exists among the natives; they, however, adhere to certain traditionary usages, and exhibit more of a moral and peaceable character than most other savage nations. Their notions of God and religion are likewise extremely limited, being confined to some general but very indistinct ideas of two great spirits; the one good and benevolent; the other evil and wicked. In their pagan state, the Greenlanders, except the angekocs, or sorcerers, evince but little desire to obtain any knowledge of either the good or the evil spirit. The angekocs are a set of deceivers, who pretend to have intercourse with the great spirit, by means of a torngak, or inferior spirit; and who, by their tricks, play upon the ignorance and superstition of the credulous.

To a foreigner the acquisition of the Greenland language is not an easy task. For though very regular in its construction, it has no affinity to any other known language. It is very copious in words and phrases, relating to things about which they are conversant, but for religious and scientific subjects it affords scarce any terms, which rendered it exceedingly difficult for the missionaries to discourse with the natives on such topics, till after the conversion of some of them, who soon found appropriate phrases by which to express the new ideas awakened in their minds.

Notwithstanding the rigours of the climate and the sterility of the soil, the missionaries have succeeded in laying out gardens, in which they grow lettuce, cabbages, radishes, turnips, and a few other early vegetables. However, as they cannot be sown before June, and killing frosts commence again in September, they remain small, but have a fine flavour. All their attempts to cultivate oats and barley have hitherto proved ineffectual, for though they spring up very fast, they never come to maturity. The missionaries have also introduced the breeding of sheep and goats, though the procuring of hay for them, for the long winter, is attended with much trouble and labour, as it must be sought for in the valleys. In Lichenau, which till lately was the most southern settlement, they generally keep a flock of ninety or a hundred sheep, as more grass grows there than either in New Herrnhut or Lichtenfels, where they seldom have more than twenty.

The different classes of animated nature furnish both the natives and Europeans with several sorts of wild animals, serviceable either for the table or for traffic: such as reindeer, hares, foxes, white bears, several kinds of winged game, a great variety of fishes, especially herrings, which in the beginning of summer come into the bays in such shoals, that whole boats can be filled with them in a few hours. But of all animals peculiar to this country, none are of greater importance to the Greenlanders than seals, of which there are five kinds. These not only constitute their principal food, but they furnish them also with clothing and bedding, with covering to their boats, tents and houses, with oil for their lamps, and various implements for fishing and hunting, and even serve them as a medium of traffic, instead of money.

Europeans, however, must derive their chief support from Denmark, as not only their health, but their very life, is endangered, if necessitated to live upon the food of the natives for any length of time. Our first missionaries experienced all the horrors of being driven to this necessity, of which the reader will find affecting proofs in the subsequent narration. But their successors have for many years been happily relieved from this distress, as an ample supply of provisions can now be regularly sent out to them, by the ships which annually arrive from Copenhagen; and for more than ninety years they have only met with one serious and alarming disappointment in this respect.

In the year 1732, during a discussion of the Brethren at Herrnhut, respecting the duty of Christians to send missionaries to heathen nations, two young men, Frederick Boenish and Matthew Stach, offered themselves to go to Greenland (as has been mentioned in the Introduction). After minute inquiry into their motives and qualifications, for such an undertaking, their offer was accepted. But nothing could be done that year with regard to the Greenlanders, as the mission to St. Thomas required all the attention and resources of the congregation. The following year, however, it was resolved no longer to defer the commencement of a mission to Greenland.

In order to effect this benevolent purpose, Matthew Stach, and his cousin Christian Stach,* proceeded to Copenhagen early in the spring of 1733, conducted by Christian David.† Nothing can more strikingly exhibit the zeal of these devoted servants of Christ, than the truly apostolic spirit in which they entered upon their arduous labour in his vineyard. They literally obeyed the injunction of Christ to his disciples, when he sent them out to preach the gospel: Take nothing for your journey, neither staves nor scrip, neither bread, neither money, neither have two coats apiece. "There was no need of much time," says one of them, "or expense for our equipment." The congregation consisted chiefly of poor exiles, who had not much to give, and we ourselves had nothing but the clothes on our backs. We had been used to make shift with little, and did not trouble our heads how we should get to Greenland, or how we should live there. The day before our departure a friend in Venice sent a donation, and part of this we received for our journey to Copenhagen. Now we considered ourselves richly provided for, and therefore would take nothing of any one on the road, believing, that he, who had procured us something for our journey at the very critical moment, would also supply us with every thing requisite for accomplishing our purpose, whenever it should be needful."‡

On their arrival in Copenhagen they were kindly received by many friends, and met with particular cordiality from Professor Ewald, a member of the Danish Mission-College, and the Rev. Mr. Reuss, one of the king's chaplains. But to many their design appeared romantic and unseasonable; for as the Danish mission in Greenland had been greatly reduced, the government was inclined to withdraw the colony, and relinquish the mission altogether. In this case, though our brethren might proceed to Greenland with the ship, which must be sent out to bring home the colonists, their settling on that inhospitable shore would be rendered extremely unsafe and dangerous, as they would not only be left without a regular supply of provisions from Europe, but be exposed to the cruelty of the savages, who might even murder them.

This unfavourable prospect, however, did not dispirit our missionaries. They committed their cause to Him who orders all things according to the counsel of his own will, fully persuaded that if their intentions were pleasing in his sight, he could be at no loss for ways and means of bringing them to Greenland, and of supporting and protecting them when landed there. In this confident hope they were not disappointed. Affairs soon took a different turn; the king consented that one more ship should go to the colony at Godhaab, where the Danish missionary, Hans Egede, resided.

The way being thus opened, the missionaries waited on count Pless, first lord of the bed-chamber, entreating his interest in their behalf. At first, their proposal did not meet with much approbation. To a person of his rank and education, who was not ignorant of the little success which had attended the labours of the learned, indefatigable, and zealous Mr. Egede, it must have appeared a wild scheme indeed, for young illiterate persons to engage in so difficult, and seemingly hopeless, an undertaking. He therefore raised many objections, and sent them to some divines to be examined; but being once convinced of the soundness of their faith, and the uprightness of their intentions, he conceived a great regard for them, readily condescended to present their petition to the king, and seconded it to the utmost of his power. Among other arguments, he made use of the following, which deserves to be recorded: "God has in all ages," said he, "employed the meanest, and in the eyes of the world, the most unlikely and even despicable instruments, for accomplishing the grand designs of his kingdom, to show that the honour belongs to Him, and to teach mankind not to rely on their own penetration or power, but on his benediction."§

His exertions had the effect of inducing the king to resolve on promoting with renewed vigour the improvement of the country, and conversion of its inhabitants, and accordingly he accepted the voluntary overture in the most gracious manner, and desired that other brethren might soon follow those now about to sail. His majesty even condescended to recommend them to Mr. Egede, in a letter written with his own hand.

* Fr. Boenish, being absent from Herrnhut on a long journey, could not then accompany his friends, but followed them the next spring, and laboured in that mission upwards of twenty-eight years.

† Christian David was a native of Moravia, and the person by whose interposition Count Zinzendorf was induced to receive the Moravian emigrants on his estate. God afterwards employed him as a blessed instrument of leading many of his persecuted countrymen to a saving knowledge of the gospel, and of promoting their emigration to Herrnhut. Further particulars of him may be read in Hist. of B. Church, Vol. I. Part 2.

§ Crantz, Vol. I. p. 325.

While the missionaries were preparing for their voyage, they formed a pleasing acquaintance with many worthy characters and persons of distinction in Copenhagen, who not only commended their zeal; but, without their solicitation, provided them with the needful expenses for their voyage, and various necessary articles for their first settlement in Greenland.[*]

They sailed from Copenhagen on the 10th of April, and after a safe and speedy voyage reached the place of their destination on the 20th of May. Immediately on their arrival, they repaired to the Rev. Mr. Egede, who received them with much cordiality, expressed his joy at their undertaking, and promised them all the assistance in his power, especially in their learning the language.

As soon as their first interview with Mr. Egede was over, they went to the sea coast to seek for a habitable spot. Having fixed on a place near Ball's river, to which they afterwards gave the name of New Herrnhut, they kneeled down and invoked the blessing of God on themselves and their undertaking. Their first labour was to erect a small hut, as a shelter against the inclemency of the climate. A few days after they laid the foundation for their proper dwelling, for which they had brought the timber with them from Copenhagen. The season was remarkably in their favour, the ice and snow having melted a month sooner than usual. Besides their own house, they built one after the Greenland manner, for the accommodation of such of the natives as might be induced to come to them for instruction.

This first difficulty surmounted, others of a far heavier kind daily pressed upon them. It became needful to think of some method of maintaining themselves, and this was no easy task in a country like Greenland, and among savages, whose mode of living was filthy and disgusting in the extreme, and with whose language they were unacquainted. Our brethren, however, did not despond: they bought an old boat from the captain who had brought them over; but the very first time they put to sea in her, to search for drift-wood among the islands, they were overtaken by a storm, reached home with much difficulty, and in the night their boat with her whole cargo of wood was carried off by the wind. Some Greenlanders indeed brought her back in a few days, but greatly damaged. They obtained little by fishing and hunting, being unaccustomed to these occupations, and unable to manage their kajak. Considering these adverse circumstances as a warning not to enter too deeply into the cares and pursuits of this life, they came to a resolution, when other work failed them, to earn something by spinning.

The acquisition of the Greenland language was another difficulty they had to encounter. Mr. Egede afforded them all the assistance in his power; but to men like our missionaries, whose education had been confined to that of a common school, it proved no easy task. Unacquainted with the very terms of grammar, the application of them to a barbarous language became doubly difficult, especially as that language contains a variety of declensions and conjugations, diversified by new moods, and perplexed by suffixes, both active and passive. They had besides to commit to memory a large vocabulary of words, as the Greenlanders have often ten different words to express the same thing. And if to this be added, that before they could understand their instructors, they had to learn the Danish language, their patience and perseverance will appear truly great.

As yet they had few opportunities to engage in their proper calling. They wisely resolved not to enter into conversation on religious subjects with the natives for the present, lest their deficiency in the language should lead them to employ phrases which might convey erroneous ideas of divine things. The Greenlanders, indeed, showed but little disposition to hold much intercourse with them, for though nearly two thousand lived at that time on Ball's river, they spent most of the summer among the islands and hills, for the purpose of catching seals, and hunting reindeer; and during the winter, they were accustomed to go sixty and even two hundred leagues to the north or south to visit their acquaintances. Few of them, therefore, called upon the missionaries; and if any did come, it was chiefly to see their buildings, or to beg nails, fish-hooks, knives, and other articles, or even to steal them. If the missionaries visited them, they seldom found any one willing to lodge and entertain them, even though offered a recompense for it; and instead of entering into discourse with them, they were continually asking, whether they would not soon go away again.

A trial, severer than any of these, was permitted to exercise their faith and fortitude, at the very beginning of their labours. A few months after their arrival the small-pox broke out among the natives. As this disease was unusual in the country, it was not understood at first, neither could the savages be prevailed upon to apply proper remedies, or use any kind of precaution to prevent the progress of infection. The contagion, therefore, spread rapidly, and made such ravages as threatened the total depopulation of the country. It continued from September, 1733, to the following June, and spread forty leagues north of the Danish colony, and probably as many south. In the district of Ball's river only eight recovered, and Mr. Egede computed that the number of the natives carried off by this distemper, amounted, probably, to two or three thousand.

The misery endured by the Greenlanders at this period is inconceivable. Tormented by excruciating pain, a raging fever and burning thirst, their patience entirely forsook them; they would neither take medicine, nor use any regimen. The consequence was, few survived the third day. Some stabbed themselves or plunged into the sea to terminate their sufferings, and others fled to desert islands. In one of these the missionaries found only one little girl, with the small-pox upon her, and her three little brothers. The father, having first buried all the people in that place, laid himself and his youngest sick child in a tomb, erected of stones, and ordered his daughter to cover them with skins and stones, that they might not be devoured by foxes and ravens; and then gave her and her brothers two seals and some dried herrings to live upon, till they could get to the Europeans.

During this dreadful period our missionaries faithfully assisted Mr. Egede in visiting and taking care of the sick. The latter lodged all that fled to him, and the former accommodated as many in their house as they had room for. But they were grieved to perceive that this severe affliction, generally speaking, made no salutary impression upon the natives, and excited no concern in them for the future and everlasting state of their souls. In a few instances, however, their kindness touched the savages, as it exceeded what they could have expected from their own countrymen. One man, in particular, who had always derided them in the days of health, made this confession before his end to Mr. Egede: "You have done for us what our own people would not do, for you have fed us when we had nothing to eat; you have buried our dead, who would else have been devoured by the dogs, foxes and ravens; you have also instructed us in the knowledge of God, and have told us of a better life." In some children, also, whom he had baptized, he perceived resignation to death and a comfortable hope of a resurrection to life eternal.

No sooner had the missionaries finished their labour of love to the poor, sick, and dying Greenlanders, than they were themselves attacked by a violent eruptive disorder, which so increased in the winter, that they nearly lost the use of their limbs. Providentially, however, they were not both confined at the same time. Mr. Egede behaved towards them like a father and friend, and his excellent wife never omitted sending them some refreshment or cordial, when she had any herself; indeed so great was her kindness, that they were often scrupulous of accepting her presents.

Amidst such accumulated trials did the Brethren's missionaries commence their career in Greenland; yet, though their ardour might at times be damped, their zeal was not extinguished. This is evident from their own declarations. In letters, addressed to their brethren in Europe, they express themselves to the following effect: "The present circumstances (referring to the contagion) appear mysterious. We know not what to pray for, whether for the life or death of these poor creatures. Perhaps God intends to preserve a holy seed in a few persons as he did at the deluge. May the Lord teach us to believe and venerate the secret purposes of his will. At present we are in the school of faith, and the prospect before us is clouded and almost dark. We perceive no traces of any good work begun among the heathen; no, not so much as a sigh, and the poor creatures find death where they should find life. As far as respects ourselves, appearances are equally discouraging. We have not the strength and vigour of body requisite for enduring the hardships of this country, and at present we suffer much from sickness; yet we have a persuasion that this may eventually tend to enure our constitutions to the climate, and qualify us for the Lord's service in this country. We are conscious of our total insufficiency in ourselves; every good of mere natural growth, even our alacrity in learning the language, seems to droop, and nothing remains but what grace hath wrought. The Lord best knows why he called to this station the most feeble and inexperienced of his servants. However, we will remain on our post, and vie with each other in the exercise of faith, though the prospect presents us with nothing but apparent impossibilities: yes, here we will stay till Jesus our Lord helps us; and our only concern shall be to please Him. We have one unfailing source of hope and comfort, that God often suffers his children to pass through straits to attain the object in view, and that we are remembered in prayer by many children of God in Europe."

[*] In one of his conversations with them, count Pless asked: "How they intended to maintain themselves in Greenland?" Unacquainted with the situation and climate of the country, the missionaries answered: "By the labour of our hands and God's blessing;" adding, "that they would build a house and cultivate a piece of land, that they might not be burdensome to any." He objected that there was no timber fit for building in that country. "If this is the case," said our brethren, "then we will dig a hole in the earth and lodge there." Astonished at their ardour in the cause in which they had embarked, the count replied: "No; you shall not be driven to that extremity; take timber with you and build a house; accept of these fifty dollars for that purpose."—Crantz, I. 326.

Thus passed the first year of their abode in these polar regions, and for the five succeeding years their circumstances, both as to externals and their principal aim in residing in that inhospitable country, were not materially improved. It is not surprising, therefore, that they should at times be ready to lose courage and even consider it more advisable to return to Europe. But when, in the year 1734, two new assistants, Frederic Boenish and John Beck, arrived and brought them the joyful intelligence, that it was the intention of the brethren at Herrnhut, to support the mission to the utmost of their power, their drooping faith was revived, and the flame of holy zeal in their arduous service rekindled.

They now redoubled their diligence in learning the language, and by indefatigable perseverance conquered the principal difficulties; and so far became masters of it, as to understand the natives, and to converse with them on common topics; but when they wished to speak with them on religious subjects, they were greatly embarrassed. Herein they could obtain little assistance from their instructers, who told them that it would not be possible to translate any, but historical, pieces from Scripture; as the Greenlanders had no terms for expressing spiritual and divine subjects, and were unable to form even the least idea of them. In some time, however, by the help of God and frequent intercourse with the natives, they overcame this last and most formidable obstacle to their usefulness.

The missionaries continued to make frequent visits among the natives; and as they were still defective in the language, they read to them some pieces, translated by Mr. Egede, such as the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed: reminded them of what he had formerly told them of the creation of the world, and the redemption of man, and tried to rectify what they had misapprehended. They readily gave their assent to these things, but as yet attained no saving knowledge of divine truth. Once, when Matthew Stach read a short prayer to them, they observed that the language indeed was very good and intelligible, but they could not comprehend the meaning of the words, Jesus Christ, of being redeemed by his blood, and of knowing, loving, and receiving him. By these visits, however, they gained one point of no small importance. Their free and affable, but yet prudent and serious deportment, equally removed from unbecoming levity and austere moroseness, won the esteem and confidence of the natives, so that they sought their company, constrained them to come into their houses, requested frequent visits, and promised to call upon them in return. The latter our brethren gladly encouraged, though, as yet, it seemed to be attended with little benefit, and often proved very troublesome.

The number of missionaries having been now increased to five persons, they formed some regulations among themselves, tending to their mutual edification, and the furtherance of the work in which they were engaged. They more especially agreed mutually to weigh, as in the sight of God, whether they felt a divine conviction, that he had called them to labour among the Greenlanders. After some weeks' consideration, they frankly disclosed to each other their sentiments on this important subject. The result was, that Christian David, having only been appointed to conduct the first missionaries to the country, and being already in years and not able to learn the language, considered himself at liberty to return to Europe, but pledged himself to support the mission, wherever he might be, to the utmost of his ability. Christian Stach, though he did not feel himself bound to devote his whole life to the service of the heathen, yet was willing to hold out ten years or longer, even if no fruit should arise from his labours. The three remaining missionaries declared, that they would bind themselves in the strictest manner to this work, to believe without seeing, to hope against hope, and even to sacrifice their very lives to the service of the heathen.

Not long after this the faith of these devoted servants of God was put to a new and very severe trial. Owing to some untoward circumstances, the ships which arrived in 1735, brought them no supplies from Europe. The whole stock of provisions they had in store, consisted only of a barrel and a half of oatmeal, part of which they bartered for malt, dried peas, and ship-biscuits, and from this scanty portion they had to provide Christian David with the needful sea-store for his voyage home; and as there was a scarcity of provisions in the Danish colony, they could receive little assistance from that quarter. Add to this, that they obtained far less by hunting and fishing this season, than any preceding year; thus famine stared them in the face. In this extremity of distress, they had no resource left them, but to buy seals of the Greenlanders, as they themselves could not catch them. But these barbarians, observing the want of the missionaries, not only rated their seals very high, but even refused to sell them at all. Frequently, after rowing round among them for two or three days, their utmost entreaties could procure but a scanty portion, and when that was consumed, they were obliged to pacify the cravings of nature with shell-fish and sea-weed. While they could procure a sufficiency of the former, they retained their health and strength, but when obliged to live chiefly upon the latter, they became greatly debilitated.

During their excursions the missionaries were often exposed to the most imminent perils. Dire necessity forced them to venture out to sea in their old leaky boat, sometimes in very unsettled and stormy weather. Once, having almost reached the land, they were driven back two leagues by a sudden squall, drenched by the breakers, and obliged to remain four days on an island without any shelter. Another time, having quite exhausted their strength at the oars, they stopped over night in a desert place, and satisfied the calls of hunger with some seal's-flesh, which they had procured from a Greenlander. Having no tent, they dug a hole in the snow and lay down, but were soon compelled to leave this retreat, as fresh snow drifted and stopped up the entrance; thus no expedient was left them, but to run up and down to keep themselves warm. Even in fair weather these excursions were not without danger. One of their number having embarked in a kajak, to angle for fish, was, by a sudden gust of wind and rolling waves, upset, and must inevitably have perished, if two Greenlanders, who were near at hand, had not come to his assistance, and, after tying him between their kajaks, towed him to land.

God did not forsake his faithful servants in these trying circumstances. He strengthened their faith in his all-sufficient providence, when meditating on the examples recorded in holy writ of his people, who were sustained in famine and dearth, in weakness were made strong, and rescued out of a thousand dangers. They proved that the same gracious God still takes care of his children, and knows how to deliver them from all their fears. Help was often at hand when least expected. Thus when they were brought to the last extremity, He, who sent a raven to feed his prophet, disposed a strange Greenlander, called Ippagan, to come forty leagues from the south, and from time to time to sell them all he could spare. This heathen, till his resources were exhausted, was the instrument in God's hand for preserving the missionaries from actual famine. What rendered this occurrence peculiarly remarkable was, that in one of their summer excursions they accidentally met with this man, who received them with much kindness, took notice of their behaviour and conversation, and entered into serious discourse with them. Yet in their distress they did not recollect him, and would hardly have found him out, if they had even made search for him. He came to them of his own accord, towards the end of the year, and pitying their deplorable condition, invited them to pay him a visit.

They now and then earned a little by writing for the Danish missionaries, till the stock of provision at the colony began to fail. By this time, however, they had not only learned to be satisfied with every mean and scanty fare, but had also enured themselves to the eating of seal's-flesh, mixing up a little oat-meal with train-oil. Those, who know the nature of train-oil, may form some idea of the hardships which they endured. Yet even this was a delicacy, compared to the old tallow candles they were frequently compelled to eat.

Almost worn out with fatigue and hardships, and not without anxious apprehensions as to their future prospects, our missionaries entered into the fourth year of their residence in Greenland. Now, at length, the Lord appeared for their effectual relief, as to their temporal support. In May 1736, they received intelligence from the Captain of a Dutch ship, lying thirty leagues to the south, that he had some goods on board his vessel, consigned to them, and which he was ordered to deliver into their own hands. One of them immediately repaired to the ship, where he was informed that Mr. Lelong in Amsterdam had sent them several articles of provisions, and that he and some generous friends intended, if they duly received the present stores, to furnish them with a fresh supply the following year. This seasonable help was the more welcome as neither they, nor the congregation at Herrnhut, had in any way solicited the aid of their friends in Holland. They gratefully accepted this generous offer, and particularly requested, that in case nothing else could be forwarded, they might be supplied with a strong durable boat, an article they needed more than any thing else for procuring the necessaries of life, and which would render them less dependant upon assistance from Europe.

They now anxiously waited for the arrival of the Danish ships. At length the third of these ships reached their shore on the 7th of July: and though they did not bring them above half the supplies they wanted, they were greatly revived and strengthened by many letters and accounts from their brethren, and by the accession of new assistants. These were, Matthew Stach's mother, a widow of forty-five years of age, with her two daughters, Rosina and Anna,[*] the former twenty-two, and the latter but twelve years old. Their conductor, George Wiesner, returned the next year to Europe. Their family being thus increased to seven persons, they were enabled to make a more regular arrangement in their housekeeping. The management of their domestic concerns was allotted to the sisters, and as it was intended that the two younger should be trained for missionary service among their own sex, they received instruction in the Greenland language, in which they acquired great proficiency.[†]

Their external affairs now began to wear a more pleasing appearance; but with respect to the attainment of the benevolent object they had in view, the Lord in his infinite wisdom saw fit to try their faith and patience a little longer. They had scarce any opportunities for intercourse with the heathen. Few called upon them, except when driven by necessity to obtain victuals, and they showed an utter aversion to religious discourse. If a missionary tarried among them more than one night, they used every diabolical art to entice him to join in their dissolute practices; and when they could not succeed in this, they endeavoured to vex and irritate him by mockeries, and by mimicking his reading, praying and singing, or by interrupting his devotions by their hideous howling and the noise of their drums. When the missionaries told them, that they did not reside in their country for the sake of temporal advantages, but to teach them the will of God, they would tauntingly reply,—"Fine fellows indeed, to be our teachers! we know very well that you yourselves are ignorant, and must learn your lesson of others.[*]"

When the savages found that they could effect nothing in this way, they resorted to other measures. They insulted and maltreated their persons. They pelted them with stones, climbed upon their shoulders, destroyed their goods, and even attempted to spoil their boat, or drive her out to sea, which would have deprived them of their chief means of support, and must have proved fatal to them. Their cruelty did not stop here. One night the missionaries perceived that some person was endeavouring to draw aside the curtains of their tent, which were fastened by a couple of pins. Going out to see who it was, they beheld, to their amazement, a number of Greenlanders with knives in their hands, who obstinately refused to go away, till they threatened them with their fire-arms. The missionaries supposed their only intention was to take away the skins which covered the tent: but some years after they learned that the savages had conspired against their lives, expecting that the other Europeans would not deem it worth their while to revenge the death of such poor despised people. And as it appeared, in the sequel, that they were instigated to this wicked attempt by some malicious persons in the colony, our brethren sent a strong remonstrance to the Danish missionaries and factor, which was duly attended to, and had the desired effect.

Notwithstanding these overwhelming discouragements, they still persevered in the path of duty. They continued their visits to the heathen, though without any visible success. Those that lived at a distance were stupid, ignorant and void of reflection; and those in the vicinity, who had long been instructed, were not grown better, but rather worse, appearing disgusted with religious discourse, and hardened against the truth. Sometimes they urged their want of understanding as an excuse, and would say: "Show us the God you describe, then will we believe in him and serve him. You represent him too sublime and incomprehensible, how shall we come to him? He will not trouble himself about us." At other times they exerted their wit in shocking and profane jests at the most sacred mysteries of religion.

Matthew Stach stayed once a whole month with some of them. He describes their behaviour towards him as very changeable. In the beginning they now and then suffered him to read to them out of the New Testament; but they soon lost their relish for this. One day, while it was raining very hard, they desired him to pray to the Son of God, whom he described as an almighty being, that he would give them good weather, and not let the rain penetrate into their houses. The missionary replied, there was no necessity for prayer in this case, as they need only spread their tent-skins upon the roof, and then the wet could not soak through; they ought rather to pray to God to have mercy on their souls. But for this they had no ears. Their conduct often became almost insufferable. Once they kept up a dance, for two whole nights successively, accompanied with the most hideous howling and drumming.[†] The children, however, showed much fondness for Stach, and used to run after him wherever he went. He conversed familiarly with them, asked them a few questions, and for a while engaged their attention; but this was soon diverted, when any new thing attracted their notice; and thus the little they had learned was speedily forgotten.

In the beginning of 1738 many Greenlanders visited the missionaries. Their chief inducement was to get provisions, with which they were supplied as far as possible. Our brethren did not neglect this opportunity, but endeavoured to excite in them a hunger after that meat which endureth unto life everlasting. Yet, as in former cases, their admonitions still failed of the desired effect.

One solitary instance, however, occurred, which served to revive their drooping spirits. Among their hungry guests, was a young heathen, of the name of Mangek, who offered to take up his residence with them, if they would maintain him, promising that he would deliver to them whatever he caught. Though they did not believe that he would remain longer with them than while the present scarcity lasted, yet they willingly admitted him, looking upon him as an instrument sent them from above, for the purpose of acquiring greater proficiency in the language. They instructed him daily, and endeavoured more particularly to make him attentive to the state of his soul. At first, their instructions seemed unavailing, but by degrees they discovered some relentings of heart, and convictions of sin; and when they prayed with him, tears generally started into his eyes. On this account his countrymen began to persecute him; and when they could not entice him to leave the missionaries, and join in their heathenish practices, they tried by various artifices to induce the brethren to put him away, falsely accusing him of having purloined several articles. Though he left them in the sequel, yet this occurrence animated their hope, and confirmed their resolution to persevere in sowing the seed of the gospel, looking to God for the increase.

[*] Both of them were in the sequel married: the elder to the missionary John Beck, and the younger to Frederic Boenish.

[†] Having had repeated occasion to speak of Mr. Egede, and of his and his wife's kind attention to our brethren, it may here be mentioned, that having requested his dismission, it was granted him in the most gracious terms, and he returned to Copenhagen this season, after having laboured in this country, with truly apostolical zeal, for fifteen years, without seeing any abiding fruit from his exertions. Towards the close of the preceding year his wife died. Crantz gives her the character of a brave, magnanimous woman, who might with great propriety be called a Christian heroine, and adds, "I have never heard her name mentioned by our brethren, but with the most respectful and affectionate expressions, for indeed she treated them on all occasions as if they had been her children." Mr. Egede was succeeded in his office, as Danish missionary, by his eldest son, who brought two assistants with him. Soon after his return to Copenhagen, the father was honoured with an audience of the King, was made superintendent of the mission in Greenland, with a yearly salary of 100*l.*, and ordered to found a seminary for students and orphans to be instructed in the Greenland language, and educated for missionary services in that country. He spent his latter years in retirement, and closed his useful and honourable life on the 5th of November, 1758, in the seventy-third year of his age.

[*] In these remarks they referred to their receiving instructions in the Greenland language.—Crantz, Vol. I. p. 368.

[†] The missionary judged the number of those present to fall little short of one hundred and fifty.

Five years had now elapsed since their arrival in Greenland, and except the case just now related, which was but like the first "dawn of the morning spread upon the mountain," they had seen no fruit from their labours. They had tilled a soil apparently unfit for culture, and, in tears, had sown the seed on hearts seemingly as cold and barren as the coast where they had pitched their tents. But now the Lord heard their prayers, and made it appear that their "judgment was with him, and their work with their God."

"June the 2d," write the missionaries, "many Southlanders visited us. Brother Beck was, at the time, copying a translation of a part of St. Matthew's Gospel. The heathen being very curious to know the contents of the book, he read a few sentences, and after some conversation with them, asked, whether they had an immortal soul, and whither that soul would go after death? Some said: 'Up yonder;' and others: 'Down to the abyss.' Having rectified their notions on this point, he inquired, who had made heaven and earth, man, and all other things? They replied, they did not know, nor had they ever heard; but it must certainly be some great and mighty Being. He then gave them an account of the creation of the world, the fall of man, and his recovery by Christ. In speaking on the redemption of man, the Spirit of God enabled him to enlarge with more than usual energy on the sufferings and death of our Saviour, and in the most pathetic manner to exhort his hearers seriously to consider the vast expense at which Jesus had ransomed their souls, and no longer reject the mercy offered them in the gospel. He then read to them, out of the New Testament, the history of our Saviour's agony in the garden. Upon this the Lord opened the heart of one of the company, whose name was Kayarnak; who, stepping up to the table, in an earnest manner, exclaimed, 'How was that? tell me that once more; for I do desire to be saved.' These words, the like of which had never before been uttered by a Greenlander, so penetrated the soul of Brother Beck, that, with great emotion and enlargement of heart, he gave them a general account of the life and death of our Saviour, and of the scheme of salvation through him."

In the mean time the other missionaries, who had been abroad on business, returned, and with delight joined their fellow-labourer in testifying of the grace of God in the blood of Jesus. Some of the pagans laid their hands on their mouths, which is their usual custom when struck with amazement. Others, who did not relish the subject, slunk away secretly; but several requested to be taught to pray, and frequently repeated the expressions used by the missionaries, in order to fix them in their memories. In short, they manifested such an earnest and serious concern for their salvation, as the missionaries had never witnessed before; and at going away, they promised soon to return, and hear more of this subject, and also to tell it to their countrymen.

The impression made on Kayarnak was not transient, for the word had taken deep root in his heart. He frequently visited our brethren, and at length took up his residence with them. He told them, that he often felt a monition in his heart to pray, and "when we speak to him," say they, "he is often so affected, that the tears roll down his cheeks." Considering the general stupidity of the Greenlanders, the missionaries were not a little surprised at the quickness with which he comprehended every thing which they told him, and at the retention of his memory. He manifested very strong attachment to them, and a constant desire for further instruction.

By means of his conversation, those who lived in the same tent with him, were brought under conviction. Thus, before the end of the month, three large families came with all their property, and pitched their tents near the dwelling of the missionaries, "in order," as they said, "to hear the joyful news of man's redemption." They all appeared much affected, and even some, who had formerly opposed the word, declared that they would now believe, and winter with the missionaries. Most of them, however, soon went away to hunt reindeer; but Kayarnak refused to accompany them, fearing he should thereby suffer harm in his soul. He was hereby brought into great straits, as he had no tent of his own. This was the third time he had been abandoned by his friends, who had now taken the skin-boat and the tent, which, in part at least, were his property. Our brethren were not without fear lest his friends should entice him away, by exaggerating the difficulties of his new mode of life, and the restrictions he would be under, compared with the unbounded liberty, or rather licentiousness, in which the heathen live. But he remained firm to his purpose, and, instead of long vindications, used to reply to their mockeries and remonstrances by a short remark like this: "Yes, I will stay with my teachers, and hear the word of God, which I have once found sweet to my taste." If they were disposed to hear him, he discoursed with them; if they railed at him, he held his peace, after he had borne his testimony to the truth in a few serious words. At length he prevailed so far with some of his nearest relatives, that they resolved to return; and even some other families desired leave to settle near the missionaries.

Thus in the beginning of October, 1738, when the Greenlanders leave their tents and move into their winter houses, above twenty persons took up their abode near the brethren. This induced them to commence regular morning and evening devotions with the two families of Kayarnak and his relation, Simek, besides the reading and expounding of the holy Scriptures on the Lord's day. Five of these persons, who appeared most serious, they selected as suitable candidates for baptism, and gave them more frequent instruction in the truths of salvation. They also began a school with the children; but this they found a most difficult and troublesome undertaking, for their scholars were so entirely unaccustomed to any kind of discipline, that it was nearly impossible to keep them to their lessons, and the parents themselves did not comprehend the use of reading and writing. They, however, succeeded so far, that some of them were able to read easy passages.

Among other evidences of a real work of grace having been begun in the hearts of some of the inhabitants in their little settlement, our missionaries notice particularly their desire to be instructed in prayer, and the remarkable change wrought in them in the prospect of death. Many of them fell sick during this period, but manifested comparatively little of that horror which generally seizes the natives when dangerously ill. Kayarnak, in a severe fit of sickness, declared, that he felt no freedom nor inclination to pray for his recovery, but was resigned to the will of God.

The year 1739 was distinguished in the mission by the baptism of the first Greenland converts. This interesting and solemn transaction was performed on Easter-Sunday, March 29th. The candidates having, before the whole assembly, given a full account of the ground of their hope, and promised to renounce all heathenish customs and superstitions, to remain with their teachers, and walk worthily of the gospel, were, in fervent prayer, with imposition of hands, commended to the grace of God, and baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The presence of the great Head of his church was felt in the most powerful manner during this transaction; the tears flowed in streams from the eyes of those just baptized, and the spectators were so overcome, that they earnestly desired to be made partakers of the same grace. The first fruits of the Greenland nation, who by this sacred rite were publicly ingrafted into the Christian church, consisted of Kayarnak, his wife, his son, and his daughter.

A month had scarce elapsed before the hope, excited by this propitious event, received a very severe shock. A banditti of murderers, coming from the north, killed Kayarnak's brother-in-law, who also lived with the missionaries, under the pretence that he had by sorcery caused the death of the ringleader's son. They decoyed him out to sea, and most perfidiously thrust a harpoon into his body; and though he drew it out and fled on shore, they pursued him, stabbed him in thirteen places, and threw him over the rocks, where, after diligent search, his body was found in a pit, and buried. This occurrence spread a dreadful panic through the whole little settlement, especially, as the murderers had threatened to kill Kayarnak's other brother-in-law. The missionaries did all in their power to allay the fears of the Greenlanders; and the gentlemen of the Danish colony, likewise, interested themselves in the affair, and so far succeeded, as to take the ringleader and several of the gang prisoners, in the presence of above a hundred of their countrymen. On his examination he confessed, that besides Kayarnaek's brother-in-law, he had killed three persons with his own hands, and had been accessary in committing three other murders. But as he was subject to no human judicature, and ignorant of the divine law, they only read to him the ten commandments, threatened him severely, and let him go. This did not dispel the fears of Kayarnak, but rather increased them; and after spending some time in great disquietude, he declared that he considered himself bound to conduct the brother of the deceased, whose life the ruffians chiefly sought, to a place of safety in the south. All the exhortations, remonstrances, and entreaties of the missionaries proved ineffectual to dissuade him from his purpose; for though he wept bitterly at leaving them, his fears prevailed, and he went to the south. Thus in the course of two weeks they beheld, with deep sorrow, their territory forsaken by most of its inhabitants, and had to endure the additional reproach that they could indeed baptize heathen, but were not able to make them real Christians, and wean them from their roving manner of life. They were little aware that this occurrence, which appeared so destructive to their hopes, would, by the over-ruling hand of God, become the means of diffusing the knowledge of the gospel in distant places, and increase the number of believing Greenlanders beyond their most sanguine expectations.

It was not long before they experienced some alleviation of the sorrow which these disastrous events had occasioned. Twenty-one boats of Southlanders passed by their settlement, and brought them the pleasing intelligence, that they had met the fugitives, who had told them many wonderful things about God, of which they wished to be better informed. After some time Simek and his family, who had accompanied Kayarnak on his flight, returned, and before winter nine families resided with them. Thus they had again full scope for their exertions; and though in their labours among these people they met with much to exercise their faith and patience, yet they had upon the whole more cause to rejoice than to mourn, as their instructions were evidently not without a blessing. The young people, in particular, six of whom attended the school, afforded them the most pleasing hopes.

Various circumstances concurred to render the year 1740 memorable in the annals of the Greenland mission.

A great change took place in the mode adopted by our brethren in their endeavours to instruct the natives. The method, hitherto pursued by them, consisted principally in speaking to the heathen of the existence, the attributes and perfection of God, and enforcing obedience to the divine law, hoping by these means gradually to prepare their minds for the reception of the sublimer and more mysterious truths of the gospel: and it must be allowed that, abstractedly considered, this method appears the most rational; but, when reduced to practice, it was found wholly ineffectual. For five years our missionaries had laboured in this way, and could scarce obtain a patient hearing from the savages. Now, therefore, they determined, in the literal sense of the words, to preach Christ and him crucified, without first "laying the foundation of repentance from dead works, and faith towards God." No sooner did they declare unto the Greenlanders "the word of reconciliation," in its native simplicity, than they beheld its converting and saving power. This reached the hearts of their audience and produced the most astonishing effects. An impression was made, which opened a way to their consciences, and illuminated their understandings. They no longer remained the stupid and brutish creatures, they had once been; they felt they were sinners, and trembled at their danger; they rejoiced in the offer of a Saviour, and were rendered capable of relishing sublimer pleasures than plenty of seals and the low gratification of sensual appetites. A sure foundation being thus laid in the knowledge of a crucified Redeemer, the missionaries soon found that this supplied their young converts with a powerful motive to the abhorrence of sin and the performance of every moral duty towards God and their neighbour; taught them to live soberly, and righteously, and godly, in this present world; animated them with the glorious hope of life and immortality, and gave them the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, as the Creator, Preserver and moral Governor of the world, in a manner far more correct and influential than they could ever have attained, had they persevered in their first mode of instruction. The missionaries, themselves, derived benefit from this new method of preaching. The doctrines of the cross of Christ warmed and enlivened their own souls in so powerful a manner, that they could address the heathen with uncommon liberty and fervour; and were often astonished at each other's powers of utterance. In short, the happiest results have attended this practice, not only on this occasion, and in Greenland, but in every other country where our missionaries have since laboured for the conversion of the heathen.

In this year their external circumstances also took a more favourable turn. Their supplies of provisions from Europe became more regular, and they were in the sequel, subject to but few disappointments; and some restrictions, under which the mission had hitherto laboured, were abrogated by a royal rescript.

The bright prospect of our missionaries, consequent on Kayarnack's conversion, had been very much clouded by his sudden flight, and by the very slender hopes they entertained of his return. But these clouds were quickly dispersed. In about a year Kayarnak returned, bringing his brother and his family along with him, whose instruction had been one principal object of his journey. The missionaries perceived, with inexpressible joy, that he had not lost ground in the knowledge and experience of the gospel, and that, during his residence among the heathen, he had diligently declared to them the way of salvation, and had daily engaged in religious exercises with his own family.

Several other Greenlanders settled at New Herrnhut about this time, and evinced a serious concern for their salvation, which drew upon them opposition from some of their neighbours. This however did not deter them from extolling the grace of God, and their exhortations, joined to a consistent conduct, had very considerable influence on their countrymen, who often expressed their astonishment at what they heard. Sometimes the missionaries took the young converts with them on their visits to the heathen, which proved of material benefit. In their absence, Kayarnak held meetings for prayer with those Greenlanders who remained at home; and a young woman, who had been baptized about this time and called Sarah, was very useful among her own sex.

Their new converts were likewise of use to them in acquiring greater proficiency in the language. In hearing the natives pray, they became familiar with expressions which they would not so readily have attained in any other way; and thus they learned from their converts to speak, after these had been taught by them to think. Therefore they now began to translate the Harmony of the four Evangelists.

It was not long, however, before a new trial befel them. In February, 1741, the first fruit of their labour, Kayarnak, was seized with a pleurisy, which terminated his earthly pilgrimage. During his illness he bore his sufferings with true Christian patience and fortitude, being filled with the hope of glory and immortality. When any of his friends began to talk with him about worldly affairs, he begged them not to encumber him with such things now, for his thoughts and affections were wholly engaged with our Saviour. Seeing some of them weep, he said, "Don't be grieved for me; have you not often heard that believers, when they die, go to our Saviour and partake of eternal joy? You know I was the first of our nation who was converted to the Saviour, and now it is his will that I should be the first to go to him. If you remain faithful to the end, we shall meet again before the throne of God and the Lamb, and rejoice for ever at the grace conferred upon us. He will know how to provide food for you, and especially for my wife." Contrary to the custom of the Greenlanders, both his wife and his brother showed much resignation at his death, and requested our brethren to bury his corpse according to the manner of believers. The gentlemen and other persons belonging to the colony of God-haab, attended the funeral. After singing some verses, one of the missionaries delivered a short discourse in the house. Four Greenland youths then carried the coffin to the place of interment. At the grave one of the Danish missionaries gave a short exhortation; and the whole was concluded with prayer. This solemn scene made a wonderful impression on those natives who were present. His death was a severe stroke to our brethren: they lost in him a bright example of the efficacy of divine grace in renovating the heart, a lively and active witness of Christ among his countrymen, and a very useful assistant in translating the New Testament.

Our missionaries still proceeded with their usual activity in visiting and instructing the heathen, in which they were faithfully assisted by their converts. Wherever these went in quest of food, they diffused the knowledge of the gospel, both by their words and by their conduct, which the pagans themselves acknowledged to be consistent with their profession. Thus, when our brethren followed them to these places, they generally found the way prepared, which greatly facilitated their labours among the savages. Indeed it appeared that a general inquiry about the way of truth had been excited among the natives inhabiting this part of the coast, which brought many visitors to New Herrnhut, and annually increased the congregation of believing Greenlanders. The missionaries, however, observed the utmost caution before they admitted any to the sacred rite of baptism, not only because the impressions, made on the Greenlanders by the gospel, often proved transitory and evanescent, but because they were ever ready to grow proud and self-conceited when they had attained the least knowledge of divine things.

As a proof that the natives had been stirred up to inquire into the truths of the gospel, the following may suffice. In 1744, when the believing Greenlanders returned from the islands, they reported that they found many heathen who gladly listened to them, when speaking of the Saviour, and desired to hear more; and those who were disposed to mock, were generally silenced by the more sober-minded. One of the baptized found a number sitting together and conversing with much earnestness about the concerns of their souls. They constrained him to bear them company, and join in their discourse. The awakening extended to a greater distance than the missionaries could conveniently visit. Of this they were informed by one of their baptized Greenlanders, who had found the savages, living many leagues to the north, very eager to be instructed. A company of them urged him to sit down and talk with them for a whole night; and when he stole away the second night, to get some rest, they followed and compelled him to gratify their desire of further conversation. Even a noted angekock, or necromancer, in that place, was much impressed. He wept two whole days, and told the people he had dreamed that he was in hell, where he saw and heard things not possible to utter, adding, that he would no longer deceive them by his diabolical delusions.

In process of time this general stir among the heathen subsided; but the believing Greenlanders increased both in number and grace. At the close of 1748, no less than two hundred and thirty resided at New Herrnhut, thirty-five of whom had been baptized during that year. And though they were not without their imperfections, yet it was evident, that they progressively attained to greater stability. In their intercourse with one another, which became more and more characterized by brotherly love, in their faithful improvement of all the means of grace, and in the composure, and not unfrequently the triumphant hope, with which they met death and looked forward to a glorious immortality, they gave many pleasing proofs of the influence of the gospel on their hearts. Impediments of one kind or other were indeed often thrown in the way by Satan and his emissaries, the angekocks, who, fearing they should entirely lose their reputation and profits, invented all sorts of stories to deter their countrymen from believing the gospel; but their efforts were feeble and could not withstand the power of divine truth.

In 1747 the missionaries erected their first church, a wooden building, the frame work and boards of which had been sent from Europe. This proved a very great convenience, as the auditory frequently amounted to three hundred persons. Store-houses were at the same time built, both for the missionaries and their converts, which, to the latter, were peculiarly useful, as they could now keep their dried meat, fish, capelins and other articles for winter consumption, in a place of safety, where they were neither injured by the cold, nor devoured by beasts of prey. In consequence of this and the good regulations introduced among them, above three hundred persons could be maintained at New Herrnhut, a place where it was formerly deemed impossible for two families to subsist. They had it even in their power to assist their poor neighbours in times of scarcity; and they were never deficient in this act of charity.

The year 1752, and the two following, were marked by circumstances of a most calamitous nature. The winters of 1752 and 1753 exceeded in severity any in the memory of the natives. The cold was perfectly horrible, and all the inlets were frozen over and blocked up with ice, so that no kajak could stir for many days; and even when any of the Greenlanders went abroad they were not sure of their lives, and returned with their hands and faces frozen, and mostly without having caught as much as a single bird. Notwithstanding the many perils to which they were exposed, when going out in quest of food, only one of the inhabitants of New Herrnhut perished at sea. Tempests, resembling hurricanes, were not unfrequent. On one occasion the storm nearly threw down the mission-house and chapel; and the violence of the waves completely shattered their new and largest boat, although drawn on shore. Famine succeeded this intense cold, and plunged the savages into the utmost distress, many being starved to death. Great as were the sufferings of the Christian Greenlanders, they were considerably mitigated by the solicitude of the missionaries for their welfare, and the more provident habits which they had acquired. A dreadful contagion followed in the train of these calamities, which carried off great multitudes, both natives and Europeans; our missionaries, however, escaped. It raged with great fury at New Herrnhut for three months. Besides those members of the congregation who died in other places, thirty-five finished their earthly race in the settlement. Many of these evidenced, in the most striking manner, the powerful and elevating influence of religion on the soul, not only leaving this world without regret, but even rejoicing at the bright prospect beyond the grave; which is the more remarkable as the Greenlanders have naturally an excessive horror of death.

During these disasters our brethren had almost daily proofs of the astonishing power of true religion in meliorating the condition of men even in this life, when comparing the situation of the Christian Greenlanders with that of their pagan neighbours. In an account of one of their visits to the heathen in 1757, they write, "We passed on to a house which, for want of blubber, the people had long since forsaken.[*] Near it we found fifteen persons half starved, lying in so small and low a provision-house that we could not stand upright, but were forced to creep in on our hands and knees. They lay one upon another, in order to keep themselves warm. They had no fire, nor the least morsel to eat, and were so emaciated, that they did not even care to raise themselves and speak to us. At length a man brought a couple of fishes. A girl took one, raw as it was, tore it in pieces with her teeth and devoured it with avidity. She looked as pale as death, and her whole countenance was truly ghastly. Four children had already perished with hunger. We distributed among them a portion of our own scanty pittance, and advised them to go to our land, which, however, they seemed rather reluctant to do, as they had never showed any inclination to hear the gospel, and had very carefully avoided all intercourse with our Greenlanders." Indeed so little did these external distresses lead the heathen to a due sense of their spiritual need, and the benefits arising from religion, that though many of them came to the settlement, and were hospitably entertained, and even acknowledged the superior excellence of the way of life of their believing countrymen, yet they manifested no real desire to become Christians, and most of them went away again as soon as the famine subsided.

The great mortality at New Herrnhut deprived the congregation of some of its best providers, and increased the number of widows and orphans. This rendered it necessary for the missionaries to make proper arrangements for the support of the destitute. In those families, where there was still a son left, the maintenance of the survivors was assigned to him. When there was no provider, the children were distributed among the rest of the families, to be trained to such kinds of manual labour as are required in Greenland. Orphans of a still younger age were confided to the care of some of the sisters; and infants at the breast were committed to those mothers who were still nursing.[†] It was pleasing to observe that the Christian Greenlanders yielded the most cheerful obedience to these regulations, and that many, who were less able, put to shame their richer neighbours. Our missionaries did not lighten the burden to themselves. They clothed several destitute children, and provided boats and other necessary implements for many of the boys, that they might be able to support themselves and their poorer relatives. For it was their constant aim to educate their young people in habits of industry, and not to collect together a company of idle and poor people, who must be burthensome to their friends in Europe.

[*] When the Greenlanders have burnt all their oil, or, as their phrase is, when the lamps must go out, they move into a close hole, which requires fewer lamps to warm it.

[†] There is nothing from which the Greenland women are more averse than to nurse the child of a stranger, lest it should become a rival in their affections to the prejudice of their own children. In this case the Greenlanders are totally devoid of feeling and compassion, and there is no alternative left for the unfortunate father, who cannot bear to witness the lingering death of his motherless infant, but to bury it alive with its mother. It affords, therefore, no small proof of the influence of divine grace, when a Greenland woman, professing Christianity, conquers this savage disposition, and becomes a kind foster-parent to an orphan child.

In their endeavours to bring the heathen to a saving knowledge of the gospel, our brethren met with many instances of its transforming and ennobling influence. Among several instances of this kind, related by Crantz in his History of the Greenland Mission, the following two, which occurred about this time, are remarkable.

"One of their earliest acquaintances was a South Greenlander, of the name of Kainack, whose intercourse with them commenced in the year 1739, and their conversation seemed even then to make some impression upon his mind. This he endeavoured to shake off; for being of a good family,* and making a great figure, he was regarded as a prince by his countrymen, and feared to lose his fancied dignity and reputation, by joining himself to the believers; for in Greenland, as well as elsewhere, decided adherence to the Lord and his people, is connected with reproach from worldly men. His conscience, however, was disquieted; and with a view to get rid of this uneasiness of mind, he led a roving life. In this state he committed several outrages. One man he beat so severely that he crippled him; at another time he lay in wait for some of the Christian Greenlanders, and threatened to set the house of the missionaries on fire, because they took a woman under their protection whom he wished to marry against her will. In the sequel, indeed, he accomplished his purpose, and this very woman proved the means of his genuine conversion. She brought him more frequently under the sound of the gospel, and thus his early impressions, which, like a smothered spark, had lain dormant in his breast, were rekindled. Having given sufficient evidence of his sincerity, he was baptized, together with his wife, at New Herrnhut, in 1753. As soon as they could leave their winter-houses, his whole household, upwards of twenty in number, removed to the settlement, and the greater part of them were, in the sequel, likewise baptized. As his conversion excited a good deal of observation in the country, our missionaries had for a while a large number of hearers, many of whom prepared to follow him. As for Kainack himself, he became as quiet and peaceable after his baptism, as he had been wild and ungovernable before. He died rather suddenly three years after, while he was among the islands, with his family, who lost in him an industrious and faithful father, and the congregation a respectable member and sincere follower of Christ."

While this instance beautifully illustrates the care of the good Shepherd, in going after his sheep which was lost, until he found and brought it to his fold; the one which follows presents us with an example of true Christian charity.

"An account being read to the congregation at New Herrnhut, of the destruction of the Brethren's settlement among the Indians at Gnadenhutten, in North America, the Greenlanders were so affected, that they burst into loud weeping, and spontaneously made a proposal to raise some contributions among themselves for their poor brethren. 'I have a fine reindeer skin, which I will give,' said one; and another, 'I have a new pair of reindeer boots, which I will send.' A third added: 'I will send them a seal that they may have something to eat and to burn.' Now, although their contributions, when turned into money, were of no great value, yet our missionaries did not choose to reject them, but ordered the amount of the whole to be remitted to the sufferers in America, as an evidence of the benevolent influence of the gospel in Greenland."

Though near two hundred Greenlanders, baptized by our missionaries, had finished their earthly career, their congregation consisted now of four hundred persons. Since the year 1742, when the first general awakening of the natives commenced, the increase had been considerable, at least in proportion to the population of the country. The same rapid increase was no longer to be expected; for as several new colonies had been established by the Danes, and provided with missionaries from the royal Mission College in Copenhagen, most of the heathen, living in the North, and near Ball's river, attended the preaching at Godhaab. Our brethren had had regular stations for preaching the gospel in the islands of Kook and Kangek, to which the Greenlanders from the South generally resorted, and where they sometimes, on their journeys to and from the North, took up their abode for a year or two, and it was chiefly from these people they had received their converts. By them, also, our missionaries had been often invited to establish a settlement somewhere in the South, as many in that part of the country were disposed to receive the gospel, but did not incline to move to New Herrnhut, being apprehensive that they would not be able to support themselves there. For though the country about Ball's river is one of the finest districts in Greenland, the natives cannot easily resolve to leave the place of their nativity and settle elsewhere, since the mode of procuring a livelihood differs more or less in every place, and a year or two are generally spent in acquiring the necessary new habits and practices, during which time they mostly suffer great want of provisions. Indeed, the missionaries themselves did not wish the settlement at New Herrnhut to become too numerous; for though the experience of subsequent years has shown, that the place is capable of supporting a considerable number of inhabitants, yet they found it difficult to maintain proper regularity and discipline in a congregation, whose number rendered attention to the individual members almost impossible, a circumstance peculiarly necessary in the care of converts from among the heathen.

For these reasons, and in the hope of extending their usefulness, they had for some years frequently deliberated on the practicability of forming a second settlement, and several places had been under consideration in this view, but none of them appeared eligible. Meanwhile the Danes established a factory at Fisher's bay, about one hundred miles to the south of New Herrnhut. This induced our brethren to transmit a memorial to the President of the Greenland Trading Company in Copenhagen, offering to form a settlement in that neighbourhood. Their offer was readily accepted; but its execution was for some time impeded.

Every needful arrangement being at length made, Matthew Stach* and two other brethren, set sail for Greenland in 1758. Having rested a few weeks at New Herrnhut, and concerted the needful measures with the missionaries there, they proceeded to Fisher's bay, on the 19th July, accompanied by four Greenland families, consisting in all of thirty-two persons, destined to make the beginning of the new congregation. It was the wish of the Trading Company that they should settle as near to the colony as they deemed most convenient for the mission. After diligently exploring that part of the country, they fixed on Akonamick, where an old Greenland house was still standing, as the most eligible spot. It is situate on an island, about three miles from the main ocean, and nearly at an equal distance from the factory, and though it affords no prospect to the sun, which is peculiarly desirable in Greenland, and his beams are entirely intercepted by a high mountain for three months in the year; yet they chose this spot, as it possessed the following three advantages: fresh water, which is never entirely frozen; a secure harbour for their boats; and a strand which remains open the whole year, and is not at too great a distance from the ocean.

In erecting their house they had to encounter various difficulties, as they had not been able to bring the necessary materials for building with them, and the place itself supplied them with very few; they could not even derive much assistance from the Greenlanders, as they had to build their own houses. They were obliged to roll the stones to the spot, carry the earth in bags, and fetch the sods by water from another place.

At first the Greenlanders found it difficult to maintain themselves at Lichtenfels, which was the name given to the new settlement: but discovering at no great distance a strait, through which the seals ran into a narrow bay, they found it practicable to prevent their escape, and thus they could often kill several at a time. This not only afforded them a providential supply, but was the more remarkable, as the natives declared they had never before seen seals in that inlet. Yet, though it alleviated the difficulty, it did not entirely remove it. A scarcity, little short of famine, prevailed in that district, for two or three years, and many of the heathen died of absolute want. The inhabitants of Lichtenfels, indeed, suffered less, yet they were often driven to great shifts, frequently having nothing to eat but a few crow-berries, left on the ground during winter, and some small meagre fishes. At other times they lived upon muscles and sea-weeds, which they gathered on the strand at low water. Yet amidst all their poverty they were content, and never complained, but helped each other as far as they could, and when one caught a seal, all the inmates of the house received a share. The missionaries could not relieve them to the extent of their wishes, being themselves reduced to great straits, especially as they had not yet been able to erect a store-house, in which to secure their provisions during the bad weather. Till this defect was removed, the Greenlanders did not reap the full benefit of their industry during the summer months. Yet, by means of their diligence they were even then able to dispose of a greater quantity of blubber to the factor at the colony, than he received from the whole district besides.

* In Greenland a man is reckoned of noble family, if he is descended from a father, grandfather, and great grandfather, who were renowned seal-catchers.

* He was one of the first missionaries who went to Greenland, but had retired to Germany to spend his latter years among his friends there. He, however, still felt the most lively interest in the mission. No sooner was it proposed to him to undertake this new expedition, than he was ready to go, especially as he had always felt a strong inclination to carry the gospel farther to the south, though he was well aware that new dangers and toils awaited him.

During the frequent voyages, which our missionaries, as well as their converts, were obliged to make, they often encountered most imminent perils, but likewise experienced the most wonderful preservation of their lives. The following instances may serve as examples.

In March 1759, four of the missionaries of Lichtenfels, in one of their voyages, were overtaken by a dreadful snow-storm, and obstructed by the drift-ice, so that they could neither proceed nor return. After long and severe toiling, however, they reached the shore, but the sea ran so high, that they were afraid to land, lest they should be dashed to pieces against the rocks. The only wish left them seemed to be that one of them might escape, to tell what was become of the rest. At length the tide made a sufficient opening between the masses of floating ice, and thus they could proceed and land with safety.

Two Greenlanders, being despatched with letters to Frederic's-haab, were obliged to sit two whole nights in their kajaks upon the ice, which at first constantly broke in with them. It was the third night before they came to a house. Had they not then been so fortunate, they would in all probability have perished, as their thirst was intolerable, having had no water for forty-eight hours. Their sweat, occasioned by severe and incessant labour, oozed through their clothes, and by the intense cold was instantly congealed to ice. One of them had his hands frozen. Both their kajaks were also much damaged.

In November the weather was uncommonly tempestuous. At one time the storm shook the mission-house as violently as if there had been an earthquake. Many Greenland houses and boats were damaged, and eight persons were lost at sea. Such was the violence of the wind, that it even split and tore open the ice, but the holes were immediately filled by drifted snow. Before and after the storm, balls of fire were observed in the air in different places. One of them fell near a house, and began to burn it. A similar phenomenon was seen about Christmas, at mid-day, while the sun was shining in its usual splendour.

Our brethren had not been long settled at Lichtenfels, before many of the natives visited them, especially those who lived near the factory, and on the other side of the island, though the way by land to both places is at least six miles through rugged valleys and over steep cliffs. Besides some widows and their children and some single women, two families took up their abode with them, and diligently attended the preaching of the gospel. Considerable impression was also made on the minds of the neighbouring heathen, who by degrees obtained a general knowledge of the truths of religion, but as yet could not resolve to relinquish their pagan customs and embrace the gospel. When the necessity of conversion was urged upon them, they always had some excuse or other to make for deferring it to a more convenient season.

However, the seed of the word sown by the missionaries, though it lay for a while buried in the earth, did not remain unfruitful. Those who resided near the factory, were for the most part very desirous to hear the gospel, and when the missionary had preached in one house, they followed him into another, in order to hear something more. One of the sailors once remarked, that these Greenlanders acted much more like Christians than the Europeans, since some of them joined together every evening, with great devotion, in praying and singing hymns. The visits to the heathen, living on the east side of the island in particular, seemed to promise a rich harvest. In January, 1760, the first heathen family was baptized at Lichtenfels. There was some resemblance between it and that of Kayarnak, the first fruits of the mission at New Herrnhut. Like the latter it consisted of father, mother, son, and daughter, they all came from the south, and had but lately settled with the brethren. The increase of this new congregation was such, that in a few years two hundred and ninety persons resided at Lichtenfels.

To return to New Herrnhut. The work of the Lord prospered. Many heathen, especially Southlanders, visited the place. Some were quite savage and indisposed to listen to the gospel.* Others were not quite insensible to its importance, yet were unwilling to make a profession. They even forbade their relations to hear the gospel, alleging, that they had seen too many examples of people, especially of young persons, who, after paying serious attention to the doctrine of Christ's suffering and death only once or twice, were so captivated, that they could never rest till they lived with the believers, and that often to the great grief of their nearest relatives. If any one, therefore, resolved to live with the believers, he might be considered as gained over to the faith, and instances of leaving the brethren, after residing with them, became more and more rare. In general they had weighed the subject for years together; their final determination in favour of Christianity might, therefore, in most cases, be considered as the effect of the operation of the Holy Ghost on their hearts. Pleasing instances of this kind were not unfrequent. The number annually added to the church by baptism was between thirty and forty, and some years it exceeded fifty. The inhabitants of this settlement, in 1769, amounted to five hundred and forty.

About this time our missionaries lost their most useful native assistant, Daniel. He received his first impressions of divine truth under a sermon of the Danish missionary, Mr. Drachart, in the year 1745, and proving by his walk, that he had sincerely embraced the gospel, he was baptized by that gentleman in 1747, at God-haab, and the following year moved to New Herrnhut. Our missionaries soon discovered that he was possessed of talents far superior to the generality of his countrymen, and as his conduct was consistent with his profession, they appointed him to assist them in preaching the gospel and instructing the natives. In this he was indefatigable, and, when any heathen visited the settlement, he never neglected speaking to them, and explaining all the regulations of the place. Yet his zeal was tempered with prudence, and when he met with people who were disinclined to hear, or turned the subject into ridicule, he did not obtrude the gospel upon them, but left them, after giving them a gentle, yet serious, reproof. In general, however, the heathen heard him gladly. His manner, when addressing them, was lively, engaging, and intrepid, but when speaking to his fellow believers, his discourses were simple, affectionate and impressive. He made frequent use of striking similes, and knew how to apply them with good effect to the hearts and consciences of his hearers. He felt truly interested in the salvation of his countrymen, and spared no pains to promote it; and for this purpose, besides his constant labours near home, he once undertook a journey of eight weeks to a considerable distance to the north, the immediate fruit of which was, that all his relations, then living, followed him to New Herrnhut, and became worthy members of that congregation. He left the world in sure prospect of a better inheritance. He was much respected at the Danish colony, and the agents of the trade used to call him the man of God, and listened to his discourses with astonishment.

Hitherto both the health and the lives of our missionaries had been remarkably preserved. Even those who came first to this country were still in full activity. Notwithstanding the many privations they had suffered, the incessant toils and hardships they had encountered, and the repeated dangers to which they had been exposed, none of them had been afflicted with any serious or alarming sickness. Now, however, a breach was made among them by the departure of brother Frederic Boenisch, who entered into the joy of his Lord on July 29th, 1763, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, twenty-eight of which he had spent in the service of this mission.

A singular circumstance occurred in the year 1768. An angekok, or sorcerer, who had often heard the gospel, but seemingly without effect, was so terrified by a dream, that from that time he altered his manner of life, preached repentance and conversion to his former adherents, and despatched messengers to New Herrnhut with the request, that a missionary would come and instruct them in the doctrines of salvation; which request was gladly complied with. It is not easy to determine how far this occurrence might tend to rouse the attention of the natives, and thus pave the way for their reception of the gospel; so much, however, is certain, that a new awakening arose in those parts, and extended as far as Lichtenfels, and even farther, and many were in the following year added to the church by baptism.[*]

* "It shocked me," says Crantz, who was then on a visit in Greenland, "to see many of them pierced to the heart, so that they trembled, snuffed, and blew like frighted deer, and sometimes, like a man in strong convulsions, tugged their coat, or boots, in order to stifle their convictions, and as soon as the preaching was over, they ran off in haste, lest the subject should be more closely applied to them."

In 1773, brother Christopher Michael Koenigseer arrived in Greenland, having been appointed to have the superintendency of the whole mission. Besides the faithful discharge of the various and important duties of his office, he rendered essential service to the mission, by the correct knowledge he acquired of the language, though already far advanced in years. Being the first missionary in that country who had had the advantage of a learned education, he was qualified to correct the translations of his predecessors, and to add several new versions. Among these were, a Greenland Hymn-book, a translation of the summary of Christian Doctrine (a kind of catechism) and some smaller pieces.

Desirous still further to extend their benevolent labours, our brethren in 1774 began a new settlement, to the south of Lichtenfels, not far from Cape Farewell, to which they gave the name of Lichtenau.[†] The first missionaries, labouring on this station were John Soerenson and his wife, and the single brother Gotfried Grillich. Four families of Christian Greenlanders had come with them to begin the new settlement. From the very first many heathen attended the preaching of the gospel, so that they frequently had above one hundred and fifty hearers, which obliged them to perform divine service in the open air, till they could erect a house for that purpose. During the winter of 1775, nearly two hundred persons resided at Lichtenau; and in a few years the number of baptized Greenlanders, belonging to that congregation, amounted to two hundred and five.

Some new regulations which were made by the Directors of the Greenland Trading Company in 1776, proved advantageous to the natives in a temporal point of view, but were in other respects detrimental to the mission. An order was issued at the same time, directing that fewer Greenlanders should reside together in one place, which, it was supposed, would promote the trade. In consequence of this, the Christian Greenlanders were in part dispersed, and obliged to take up their residence in different places, at the distance of ten or twelve miles from the settlements. This greatly increased the labour of our brethren, as they considered it their duty, besides sending a native assistant with each company, to visit them occasionally themselves. But these journeys were often rendered extremely difficult, and at times even impossible; and the converts received spiritual injury, by being deprived of the regular instructions of the missionaries.[‡]

In 1782 the country was again visited by a dreadful contagion, which occasioned great distress, both at New Herrnhut and Lichtenfels. In the former place the number of deaths from April till August amounted to one hundred and twenty-five, among whom were several native assistants, and some of the most expert and diligent providers. Many families were in consequence reduced to great straits; and sometimes there was scarce a sufficient number of healthy persons to bury the dead. In Lichtenfels the disease broke out a little later, but proved equally fatal. Under these afflicting circumstances the missionaries had this great consolation, that the patients looked forward to their dissolution in assured hope of happiness beyond the grave.

The period now under review passed without any striking incidents. The settlements at New Herrnhut and Lichtenfels received but little increase from heathen embracing the gospel, as few resided in those parts. Lichtenau, on the contrary, still remained a gathering-place, where many pagans attended the preaching, and by degrees were embodied with the church of Christ. Some of these came from a considerable distance. Thus two men visited that settlement in October, 1785, who had come from the east coast, probably a distance of at least five hundred miles, having spent the whole summer on their journey. At other times several hundred savages resided some months in their vicinity, for the purpose of procuring provisions. These occurrences were zealously improved by the missionaries, and they had the pleasure to find, that their testimony of the truth as it is in Jesus, in several instances, evinced its saving power.

As various baneful effects were observed to arise from the dispersion of the Christian Greenlanders, they resolved that a missionary and his wife should winter with them in each of their principal provision-places, in order that the regular ministry of the word and the ordinances, and the schools, might not be interrupted. They made a trial of this measure in 1786, and found it of evident utility; but in the sequel insurmountable difficulties prevented its continuance. By degrees, however, the converts themselves became sensible that they suffered much harm in their souls by their long absence from their teachers. Many therefore refused to leave the settlements in future, and most, who had removed, gradually returned.

In 1786, brother Koenigseer fell asleep in Jesus, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, the last thirteen of which he had spent in the service of this mission, being intrusted with the general superintendency of all its concerns. He was succeeded in his office by brother Jesper Broderson, a student of theology, who had arrived about two years before.

Brother Brodersen resided alternately at New Herrnhut, Lichtenfels, and Lichtenau,[*] devoting all the energies of his mind to the service of the Lord in this country. Besides his regular avocations in the work of the ministry, and the superintendency of the whole mission, he paid particular attention to the instruction of the native children and young people. He employed his leisure hours in translating several historical pieces of the Old Testament,[†] and select portions of the prophecies of Isaiah; and in compiling a selection of hymns in the Greenland language. Having brought a small printing press from Europe, he struck off a number of copies for immediate circulation, till the whole work could be printed in Germany. The mission, however, did not long enjoy his useful services. A severe fit of illness, in April, 1792, so weakened his constitution, that he could indulge no hopes of recovery in this rigorous climate, and therefore found himself necessitated to return to Europe in 1794. He had been preceded in his return to Europe by John Soerensen, being then in his eightieth year, forty-nine of which he had spent in the service of this mission.

Amidst many imperfections among their converts, the missionaries found constant cause to acknowledge, with unfeigned gratitude to God, the blessing which attended their labours for the conversion of the Greenlanders, and this they considered an ample recompence for the many difficulties and dangers which they had to encounter in the discharge of their various duties. But the dispersion of the Greenlanders continued, as in former years, to excite painful apprehensions, lest their separation from their teachers, and their being deprived of the usual means of grace in the settlement, should have an injurious influence on their spiritual course, and impede their progress in Christian knowledge and practice. In order, as far as possible, to prevent this, one of the native assistants always accompanied each party, and stayed with them during their absence from the settlement, keeping daily morning and evening devotions with them. One or other of the missionaries also visited them as often as circumstances would permit. These visits were frequently attended with much danger; for, as they must be made by water, their progress was sometimes unexpectedly obstructed by large pieces of floating ice, which damaged their boat, and left them no means of safety but by leaping on the ice, dragging the boat after them, and seeking the nearest shore.

The missionaries were exposed to great hazards in the prosecution of their temporal calling, of which the following is an instance. In June, 1791, two of our brethren, having gone to a neighbouring island to fetch drift-wood,[‡] were so completely surrounded with ice, that for many days their return remained impracticable. Their fellow-missionaries in New Herrnhut, being apprehensive for their safety, repeatedly sent Greenlanders in search of them; but these found the ice impenetrable to their kajaks. The two brethren, however, were fortunate in catching a sufficient quantity of fish to support life, and at length succeeded in finding a passage through the ice, but at a great distance from the settlement. After a most fatiguing walk over high mountains, and across extensive plains, they safely arrived at New Herrnhut, having been absent a whole month.

[*] Here ends the history of Crantz.

[†] Ten years before this period, brother Matthew Stach had visited this part of the country, which was then but little known, though most of the inhabitants in the two other settlements had come from it. He spent the winter in these parts, and the immediate fruit of his zealous exertions in preaching the gospel, was that a family of six persons moved to New Herrnhut.

[‡] This regulation, being continued in the sequel, led to the establishment of several Greenland villages, or out-places, in the vicinity of each of the settlements.

[*] New Herrnhut is the most northern, and Lichenau the most southern settlement. The distance from New Herrnhut to Lichtenfels is one hundred miles, and from there to Lichtenau four hundred miles.

[†] The Harmony of the four Gospels had been previously translated.

[‡] A great quantity of various kinds of wood annually floats down, mostly along with the ice, to the bays and islands on this coast. (See Crantz, Vol. I. p. 57.) This wood is a great benefit to this barren country, and besides answering other purposes, is used by the missionaries for fuel. If, therefore, the severity of the weather, or other

Though the natives are far more enured to the rigors of the climate, and much better able to encounter the perils connected with their mode of life, than Europeans, yet even many of them perish in consequence of these dangers; but they also often experienced the most striking preservation and deliverance. A few instances of this kind, which occurred during this period, will doubtless be interesting to the reader.

Two Greenlanders from Lichtenau, returning in their kajaks from catching seals, were so jammed in by the fresh ice, which was accumulating around them, that their destruction appeared inevitable. Their perilous situation was observed from the shore, but it was impossible to come to their assistance. Soon after the wind drove them along with the ice out to sea, and their friends, completely losing sight of them, were thrown into the utmost anxiety. In the meantime, however, they had reached a large piece of the old ice, (the only one remaining in the bay,) upon which they climbed, drawing their kajaks after them. On this piece of ice, barely large enough to afford room for them and their kajaks, they spent the night, which was piercingly cold. The next morning the new ice had attained sufficient firmness to bear their weight, and they walked home on it in safety.

A company of four Europeans and three Greenland women, travelling by land from Nappartok to Godhaab, a distance of only eight or ten miles, were so overcome by cold and hunger, that three of the Europeans, and one of the natives, belonging to the Danish factory, fell down by the way, one after the other, and were frozen to death.

But the hardships and dangers, unavoidably connected with their situation in these frozen regions, are not the only difficulties that must be encountered by a missionary. His very voyage to this country, or back again to Europe, is replete with perils. Of this brother Grillich made a most painful experience on a voyage which he made to Copenhagen on business of the mission. He left Greenland in October, 1798, with a ship belonging to Julianenhaab; but, after beating about five weeks, the vessel was so much damaged by drift-ice, that she was obliged to return to the colony. In February, 1799, he again set sail in the same ship, but the quantity of drift-ice at sea was greater than before, and they were closely hemmed in by it from the 18th to the 25th of that month. At length, finding the ship so clogged and injured by it, that she could not be saved, the captain was under the necessity of quitting her, with all the property on board. On the last mentioned day, therefore, the whole ship's company began their march over the ice, dragging a boat after them. They spent two nights in the open air, and had no means of quenching their thirst but the melted snow. On the third morning they came to open water, put in their boat, and sailed five leagues, when they again reached the barren coast of Greenland. They had scarce landed, before a tremendous storm arose with snow and sleet, so that had they been still at sea, they must have all perished. But now they were in a disastrous situation, without any food or covering for the night. On the following day, however, it pleased God to send them a favourable wind, with which they sailed five leagues, and reached the colony at Frederic's-haab in safety, where brother Grillich was detained till April, and could not reach Lichtenfels till May. He at length arrived safe at Copenhagen, October 29th, with the ship from Godhaab.

After the return of brother Grillich to Greenland, our three settlements were again visited by a dangerous epidemic, in consequence of which many of the converts departed this life, among whom were some of the most active and useful native assistants. The sorrow felt by the missionaries on account of the loss thus sustained by the whole congregation, was more than balanced by the happy frame of mind, with which the patients bore their bodily sufferings, viewing death and the grave as the avenues to immortality and eternal life.

But it was not only when visiting the sick, or attending the death-beds of their converts, that they had the pleasure to observe the gracious influence of the gospel on their minds. They frequently beheld this influence in the secret operations of the Spirit of God, convincing their hearers of sin, and leading them to our Saviour, as the only true source of happiness. Among many instances of this kind, which came to the knowledge of our brethren, they relate the following in their diary of 1804:

"One of our people called upon us, in order, as he said, to confess his abominable intention. He informed us, that on account of many quarrels which lately occurred in his family, (which he now acknowledged to have been mostly provoked by his own inconsiderate language,) he had formed a resolution to seclude himself from all society, by retiring into the wilderness. 'With this intention,' said he, 'I left home and spent some nights in a lonely place. But as I was about to proceed to a still greater distance, I thought, O how happy are those people whom the Lord himself reproveth and chasteneth when they are going astray; O that I were one of them! As I was rowing along, the sea seemed to assume a most dreadful appearance, and with all my exertions I could not get forward; my kajak appeared fixed to the bottom, though I was in the deepest part of the bay. I was frightened, and immediately tried to regain the shore. Here I spent the night in the greatest distress, and as soon as it was day returned to my family with shame and repentance. Now I most fervently thank our Saviour that he delivered me from the ways of destruction. Never more will I follow the impulse of my own heart, but He shall be my only Lord and Master.'"

In the year 1804, the missionary Rudolph and his wife experienced an almost miraculous preservation of their lives, in attempting to return to Europe, after a service of twenty-six years in the Greenland mission. They left Lichtenau on June 18th, and in the evening of that day went on board the ship, which was lying off the Danish factory at Julianenhaab; but were detained by the drift-ice, which blocked up the bay, till the 14th of July, when they weighed anchor. Having with great difficulty entered Dutch-haven, about two miles from the colony, they were again detained for several weeks by the ice and the continuance of southerly winds.

The captain being informed by some Greenlanders, that the sea, at no great distance, was free from ice, once more weighed anchor on August 22d, resolved a least to make an attempt to get into clear water. The wind was contrary and very high, and there was still much ice within sight. They sailed between huge masses of ice, which made a roaring noise, and caused a most uneasy motion in the ship. To secure her, as far as possible, from damage, several large pieces of ice were fastened to her sides with grappling-irons. Thus they cut their way through immense fields of ice, which sometimes rose mountain-high. In this manner they proceeded for three days, encountering many fears and dangers, but happily unconscious of the still more dreadful calamities which awaited them.

"Early on August 25th," writes brother Rudolph,* "a storm arose from the south-west, which drove the ice-mountains close to our ship. The scene was awful and horrible; and we expected that the ship would have been crushed to pieces. Once she struck upon a small rock, but was got off without receiving any damage. But soon after she struck her bows with such a force against a large field of ice, that several planks started at once, and the water rushed in. The captain immediately jumped into a small boat, with part of the crew; and having landed them on a large field of ice, he returned for another party. The rest were employed in loosing the large boat in order to save themselves, for the ship was rapidly filling with water, and perceptibly going down on her starboard side, so that by the time the boat was let down, only the larboard gunwale appeared above water. The captain and all the sailors having left the ship, my wife and I were alone, standing above our knees in water, and holding fast circumstances, prevent their collecting a sufficient quantity of this wood in the proper season, they are exposed to great hardships. This happened in the year 1793, when the long continuance of severe weather rendered it impracticable to procure their usual stock of drift-wood. They were consequently reduced to the unpleasant necessity of heating their rooms, during intense cold, for three months, after the Greenland manner, by burning train-oil in lamps, reserving the little wood they had for the purpose of cooking.

by the shrouds. At last, Captain Kiar* came to our assistance, saying, 'I cannot possibly forsake these good people.' By his help we got into the boat, and likewise had our hammock and bed secured.

"We left the wreck, being about a league from the land, and about seventy-eight miles distant from Lichtenau. Our boat being heavily laden, and having already taken in much water, we feared she would sink, and were therefore obliged to steer for the nearest island. It proved to be a rough, pointed and naked rock; at a considerable height, however, we found a small spot covered with short grass. We now endeavoured to land the provisions saved from the wreck, but the waves beat frightfully against the rock, and tossed the boat up and down with such violence that the rope broke, and she was driven out to sea. In order to bring her back, eight men immediately leaped into the small boat; but though they came up with the large boat, the fury of the tempest baffled all their efforts to regain the landing-place; they were driven to the other side among the ice, by which both our boats were crushed to pieces; nor did we entertain the smallest doubt that the sailors had perished, as it seemed impossible for them to get over the ice to the shore, the waves rising so exceedingly.† All our hopes of being saved now vanished, and the whole company gave vent to their feelings in general and loud cries and lamentations. In the evening we lay down to rest, close together, without tent or covering. As it continued to rain heavily the whole of this and the following day and night, the water rushed down upon us in torrents from the summit of the rock. We were completely soaked in wet, and lay in a pool of water. But this was in reality a benefit to us, as we were thus supplied with fresh water.

"August 27th, the two captains and most of the sailors got ready to try to gain the shore by walking across the ice; and with great difficulty succeeded in their attempt. We would willingly have gone with them, but having now been two days without tasting any food, we felt ourselves too much enfeebled for such an enterprise. Thus we were left alone on the rock, with the ship's cook, who likewise was unable to follow his comrades. In this dreadful situation we had no hope but what we derived from the Lord our Almighty Saviour. We now saw no other prospect before us, than that of ending our days on this barren rock. The thoughts of lying here unburied, as food for ravens and other birds of prey, which were always hovering around us, troubled us for a short time, but the consolations of our Saviour preponderated, and we soon felt entirely resigned to his will."

The captains and sailors, having meanwhile reached the land, immediately despatched some Greenlanders in search of brother Rudolph and his wife. These Greenlanders, after rowing about the whole day of September the 2d, without seeing any person on the rock, were on the point of returning, concluding that they had perished. Fortunately, however, sister Rudolph, happening to raise herself, discovered the Greenlanders. From them our missionaries got a little seal's fat and a few herrings, having been without food for nine days. As they came in their kajaks, and had no other boat with them, brother Rudolph and his wife were obliged to spend another night on the rock, and wait till the evening of the next day, when a skin-boat arrived. In her they embarked; and after enduring several hardships, reached the colony of Julianenhaab in the evening of the 8th, and proceeded to Lichtenau on the 11th, where they were affectionately welcomed by their fellow-missionaries and the whole congregation, who joined them in grateful praises to God for this wonderful preservation of their lives.

Here they remained till the following May, when they again prepared for their voyage to Europe. After a very tedious and difficult passage in a Greenland boat, from Lichtenau to Lichtenfels, they left the latter place on the 13th of September in one of the Danish ships; and being favoured with a very expeditious and pleasant voyage, arrived in Copenhagen on the 3d of October.

Little did our brethren in Greenland imagine that the war, which during this period was raging with such violence on the continent of Europe, would extend its ravages to the remote corner of the earth which they inhabited. But, though they were happily out of the reach of contending armies, yet they experienced some of the fatal effects of the contest. The rupture between Great Britain and Denmark occasioned a temporary suspension of the accustomed intercourse between the latter country and her colonies, which are wholly dependant upon Europe for support. This awakened many gloomy apprehensions, both among our brethren and the other colonists; and this fear was considerably increased, as one of the two ships sent out by the English government in 1808 was lost in the ice, and the provisions prepared for them in London in 1809 could not be sent, as it was found inconvenient to fit out ships from Great Britain to Greenland. Another misfortune they experienced was the capture of a Danish provision-ship by the British, and thus only one small vessel arrived that year; the cargo of which was by no means sufficient to supply the many factories on the coast. Our missionaries in New Herrnhut and Lichtenfels thus express themselves on the occasion: "Though we have not yet felt absolute want of the necessaries of life, yet we are obliged to measure (as it were) every mouthful we eat, to make our provisions last as long as possible." Their stock of wine was so reduced, that they could but very seldom celebrate the Lord's Supper, which was a great grief to their converts. Another very serious inconvenience was the want of sufficient change of clothing, especially linen, and of tobacco, which is the principal medium of traffic in this country.

This distress was felt most severely at Lichtenau, as appears from the following extract of a letter, written by the missionary Beck in 1813:

"In 1807 we received the last regular supplies, which were sufficient, in addition to what we had spared in former years, to maintain us for a considerable time; and as we hoped that the interruption occasioned by the war would not last long, we felt no anxiety; but when both the colonists and our brethren at New Herrnhut and Lichtenfels began to suffer want, we even helped them out of our store to various necessary articles; of which, however, we ourselves afterwards felt the want. In the north there was yet some trade, by which partial relief was obtained, but here nothing could be had from that source. Yet we thanked God that there still existed the means of supporting life, though we suffered many privations, such as of beer, coffee, sugar and wine, and afterwards of butter and salt; we made the latter last as long as possible, by boiling fish in salt water; and though whatever was sent to us in 1810 did not arrive here till 1812, we have to thank our heavenly Father for having given us our daily bread. At last we were the only people that had any tobacco. By this we were enabled to purchase birds and fishes from the Greenlanders, as also furs for our boats and clothing. We had likewise some seed left, and got a small supply of garden-stuff. The Greenlanders brought us scurvy-grass in barter for tobacco. The latter article, however, became at last so scarce that a pound was worth 7s. 6d."*

In this distressful situation the colonies continued till the year 1811, when the British government generously afforded every facility to the Danes to supply their Greenland factories, by permitting Danish provision-ships, furnished with a proper license, to sail thither. By this humane measure, on the part of England, they were relieved from immediate distress and all anxiety respecting the future.

While this regulation continued in force, one of our missionaries, John Conrad Kleinschmidt, whose wife had entered into the joy of her Lord, after a residence of nearly nineteen years in Greenland, resolved to bring his five children to Europe, and for this purpose set sail in the ship Freden, bound for Leith in Scotland. They left New Herrnhut on September 2d, 1812; but owing to unfavourable weather, did not lose sight of the coast till the 25th. The wind was fair, and they had the prospect of a speedy and pleasant voyage, when suddenly there arose from the north-west a tremendous storm, which raged with unabating fury for about three days and two nights. In the evening of the 29th, when it was at its height, accompanied with thunder and lightning, a flash struck the ship. Two sailors were thrown down, one of whom instantly expired. The captain and all on board were filled with the utmost consternation, and the former exclaimed, "We are all lost, and there is no other ship near to save us." Fortunately, however, it was soon discovered that the ship had not taken fire, nor sustained any very serious damage. In the sequel they encountered several severe gales and contrary winds, which so prolonged the voyage that they were put on short allowance of water, which was peculiarly trying to the children. This privation, however, lasted only five days, as they came in sight of the Scottish coast on the 8th of October, and two days after cast anchor in Leith Roads. During their stay there, one of brother Kleinschmidt's daughters, a child only three years old, died after a short illness. On this, as well as on every other occasion, he and his company experienced the most affectionate attention from many worthy gentlemen at Leith and Edinburgh, who proved themselves sincere and generous friends to our missions.*

---

* Captain K. was not the master of the ship in which the missionaries sailed, but belonged to one which had been stranded near Statenhuck, and was now returning to Europe.

† Their fears were fortunately unfounded, as all the sailors, excepting one, succeeded in their efforts to get to land.

* Per. Acct. Vol. VI. p. 196. In some of the colonies the distress was still greater. The colonists were reduced to the necessity of eating small herrings, muscles, and even sea-weeds; many of them, therefore, left the country.—Per. Acct. Vol. V. p. 195.

During his absence a most tragical event occurred in the congregation which he had hitherto served in the gospel. A party of Christian Greenlanders having celebrated Christmas at the settlement, were returning to one of the out-places, where they resided by an order of government, intended to promote the interests of trade. They set out in their skin-boat in January, 1813, when the cold was so intense that the thermometer stood twelve degrees below Reaumur's freezing point. They had soon to encounter the floating ice, by which their boat was crushed to pieces. They, however, escaped upon a large field of ice, and drove about for twenty-four hours, when during the night a violent storm arose from the north, which carried them out to sea. Here they must all have perished, as nothing more was heard of them. They were seventeen in number, old and young, and all baptized members of the congregation at Lichtenau.

After spending the winter at Fulnek, in Yorkshire, and having again married, brother Kleinschmidt and his wife, in company of the missionary Gorke† and his wife and their infant daughter, and of brother Mueller and sister Goll, sailed from Leith in the Danish ship Hualfisken for Greenland. They left Scotland on May 24th, 1813; and, after a safe and expeditious voyage of five weeks, arrived at Godhaven, in Diskobay; the captain, contrary to his engagement, refusing to land them near any of the mission settlements. This ungenerous conduct on his part was the more reprehensible, as there was every facility of landing them either at Lichtenfels or New Herrnhut. Even the mate and sailors remonstrated with him on the cruelty of his behaviour, but to no purpose, for he continued his course day and night, and the only reply he made was, "Never mind, they have the summer before them." The consequence was, that they had to travel back in a boat, coasting it all the way, six hundred miles to New Herrnhut, and ninety more to Lichtenfels; and brother Kleinschmidt and his wife, after reaching New Herrnhut, had still to perform a voyage of five hundred miles before they arrived at Lichtenau, their place of residence. But, through the Lord's mercy, they all got home before winter set in, though brother Kleinschmidt's party were four months in completing their voyage along this rocky and dangerous coast. All the toils and perils of their journey were quickly forgotten, when they found themselves again in the midst of their brethren and sisters, and beheld the grace of God which prevailed in the Greenland congregation.

The affairs of the mission were now again brought into their regular course. Each of the three settlements was provided with the requisite number of missionaries, and every anxious apprehension respecting their support was removed, in consequence of the regular intercourse re-opened with Europe. Hereby our brethren were animated to renewed exertions in promoting the cause of God, and the best interests of their fellow-men, in these dreary regions.

Their time and attention were particularly occupied in devising means for enlarging the acquaintance of the natives with the doctrines of the Bible. A version of the Harmony of the Four Gospels, together with select portions of the prophecies of Isaiah, had been in use among them for several years. To add to their sources of information on scripture truths, brother Gork, about this time, translated a small work, entitled Jesus, the Friend of Children, being a short compendium of the Bible, and recommended by a society of pious ministers in Denmark, for distribution among the Greenlanders. But their chief concern was to furnish them with a good and correct translation of the New Testament; to which they were greatly encouraged by the kind offer of both the British and Foreign, and the Edinburgh Bible Societies, to get the work printed for them. The execution of this important undertaking was committed to brother Kleinschmidt, who had obtained great proficiency in the language by his long residence in the country. His many other avocations, however, and his desire that the manuscript should be previously revised by the other missionaries who possessed a competent knowledge of the language, in some measure retarded its progress; but this temporary delay eventually proved a real benefit, as it tended to render the version more correct.

According to the latest intelligence received from Greenland, and which brings down the history of this mission to the spring of 1817, it appears, that amidst the imperfections and occasional deviations of individual members of the congregation, the work of God was prospering in all the three settlements, and the word of the cross displaying its converting and transforming power in old and young. The peace of God, unity of spirit, and a determination to spend their lives for the Lord Jesus Christ, prevailed among our missionaries; and they lived in habits of cordial love and friendship with the gentlemen of the Danish factories, and all the colonists.

In November, 1816, they had the joy to baptize an adult heathen at New Herrnhut, a circumstance which had not occurred in that settlement for sixteen years, and on this account made a deeper and more solemn impression on all who witnessed this sacred transaction. In the same place the missionary, Henry Menzel, entered into the joy of his Lord on the 21st of October, 1816. He had laboured thirty-three years with zeal and faithfulness in the Greenland mission.

Since the commencement of this mission a very remarkable difference has taken place in the state of the country, in a moral point of view. In the neighbourhood of New Herrnhut and Lichtenfels scarce any heathen reside, most of the inhabitants having been baptized either by the Danish missionaries or our brethren, and acquired a general knowledge of the truths of Christianity. These settlements, therefore, may be considered as forming two Christian congregations, the children and youths of which are baptized in infancy, and from their earliest years instructed in the doctrines of the gospel; and upon giving sufficient evidence of the sincerity of their profession, admitted to all the ordinances and privileges of the church. And our missionaries have had the pleasure of finding that hardly any of their young people have entirely forsaken the fellowship of the faithful; for, though they might for a season remain spiritually dead, they have sooner or later been awakened by the Spirit of God, to a sense of their lost condition by nature, and their need of a Saviour, and by his grace been taught to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. Thus has God's promise to his church been verified also in this country: "Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children."

In Lichtenau the case is in some degree different. Here there is still a large field for missionary labours, as a very considerable number of heathen still reside in that neighbourhood. To them our brethren are daily proclaiming the unsearchable riches of Christ. Many pagans also visit them and behave with civility. For the most part indeed they come only to be supplied with the necessaries of life; now and then, however, a desire is excited for the bread of life, and the seed of the gospel falls on good ground, where it produces the fruits of "repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ." Thus some heathen are annually added to the church by baptism.

The long intercourse of the natives with Europeans, added to the more potent influence of the gospel, has effected the most pleasing and striking change in their manners and general deportment. Along the whole extent of the western coast the barbarities of savage life, and the enormities ever attending paganism, where it is dominant, are now rarely to be met with; and the state of this country, compared with what it was eighty, or but fifty years ago, may be called civilized. The nature and climate of this dreary region, no less than the methods by which the natives must procure their subsistence, necessarily preclude the introduction of most of the useful arts of civilized society. They can neither till the land nor engage in manufactures. The former is denied them by the sterility of the rocks they inhabit, and the rigors of a polar sky; and the latter, with very few exceptions, are for the same reasons rendered useless. A † Brother Gorke had lived in Greenland before, but left it seven years ago to pay a visit to Europe, where he had been thus long detained in consequence of the war. The rest were new missionaries.

Greenlander can neither live in the European manner, nor wear European clothing. But it may be said with truth, that the converted Greenlanders, by the habits of industry which they have acquired since the introduction of the gospel among them, by their contentment amidst many privations and hardships, and by the charity of the more affluent of their needy brethren, strikingly exemplify the doctrine of the great apostle of the Gentiles, that in every circumstance of life and in every nation, godliness is great gain, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

CHAPTER II.

MISSION IN LABRADOR.

Labrador lies on the east side of Hudson's bay, extending from latitude 57° to 60° north. Although this latitude is not as high by several degrees as that of Greenland, yet the cold here is far more intense.* During the winter Fahrenheit's thermometer often falls thirty or more degrees below the O; and though the houses of the missionaries are heated by large cast-iron stoves, the windows and walls are all the winter covered with ice, and the bed-clothes freeze to the walls. Rum freezes in the air like water, and rectified spirits soon become thick like oil. From December to June the sea is so completely frozen over, that no open water is to be seen. Some of the missionaries venturing once, during the month of February, to make a journey from Nain to some Esquimaux, living at the distance of forty miles, endured extreme hardships from the cold. Though wrapped in furs, yet their eyelids froze together in such a manner that they were continually obliged to pull them asunder, and by constant rubbing prevent them from closing. One of them returned with a pain in his side; another with his hands frozen and swelled like a bladder; and it was only through God's mercy that their lives were preserved. It is no uncommon case in winter for some of the natives to be found frozen to death. The few summer months, on the other hand, are so much the hotter, the thermometer sometimes rising to the eighty-sixth degree of Fahrenheit. Swarms of musquitoes infest the air, whose sting frequently causes painful swellings.

The coast is but thinly inhabited; and the Esquimaux differ little in their general manners and mode of living from the Greenlanders, of whose language theirs is only a dialect. In summer they live in tents constructed like those in Greenland, but their winter habitations are built in a very different manner. For this purpose they chose a large drift of snow, dig an oval hole in it, in size corresponding with the dimensions of the intended house. They then cut pieces of snow, three feet long, two in breadth, and one foot thick. These they place in the form of an arch over the hole. Instead of a window, they cut an aperture in the arch, in which they fix a slab of ice, and which admits sufficient light. The entrance into the dwelling is long, winding, and very low, and a slab of frozen snow answers the purpose of a door. In the middle of the house they leave an elevation of about twenty inches high, which they cover with skins, and this serves them for a place to rest and to sleep on. Since our missionaries have settled in the country the natives have by degrees built winter-houses for themselves, constructed after the manner of those in Greenland, described in page 192.

For the purposes of travelling they make use of a sledge drawn by a species of dogs, in shape resembling a wolf. They never bark, but howl very disagreeably. They are kept by the Esquimaux, in greater or smaller packs, according to the wealth of the proprietor. They quietly submit to be harnessed, and are treated with no great mercy by the heathen, who make them do hard duty for but a scanty allowance of food. This consists chiefly of offals, old skins, entrails, &c.; or should their owner not be provided with these articles, they must provide for themselves, by seeking muscles or dead fishes. When pinched with hunger they devour almost any thing; and on a journey it is necessary to secure the harness during the night, for otherwise the dogs would eat it, and thus render it impossible to proceed. In the evening, after being unharnessed, they are left to burrow in the snow wherever they please. They are sure of returning at the call of the driver in the morning, as they then receive some food. In putting them to the sledge they are never suffered to go abreast, but are tied by separate thongs of unequal lengths to a horizontal bar on the forepart of the sledge; an old dog leads the way, running ten or twenty paces a-head, directed by the driver's whip, which is often twenty-four feet long, and can be well managed only by an expert Esquimaux. The other dogs follow like a flock of sheep; if one of them receives a lash, he generally bites his neighbour, and the bite goes round. Their strength and speed, even without food, are astonishing. The Esquimaux, however, find it more convenient to go from place to place in their boats, when the sea is open, being then much less exposed to the cold than when crossing the ice in their sledges. Their journeys, therefore, are more frequent in summer than in winter.

In their pagan state the Esquimaux appear rather more depraved than the Greenlanders. Their ideas relative to God, and religious and moral subjects, are as confined as those of the latter; and in their superstitious notions and practices there is no discernible difference between the two nations.

Their kajaks, skin-boats and other implements are of the same construction with those of the Greenlanders.

The missionary settlements lie on the eastern coast.

The disposition, on the part of the Brethren to attempt the conversion of the Esquimaux, originated with our missionaries in Greenland, who were led to conjecture, that the Esquimaux were a branch of the Greenland nation. Matthew Stach, in particular, entered with great ardour into this scheme, and for that purpose applied, in the year 1752, to the Hudson's-bay Company for permission to preach the gospel to the Indians belonging to their factories: but no attention was at that time paid to his application. In consequence of this failure some of our brethren in London, joined by several well-disposed merchants, fitted out a vessel to trade on the coast of Labrador, four brethren having declared themselves willing to settle there, for the purpose of learning the language and preaching the gospel to the natives. One Christian Erhard offered to go with the vessel. In the capacity of mate on board a Dutch ship, he had been several voyages to Davies' Straits on the whale fishery, and had visited at New Herrnhut, where he had learned a little Greenlandic, and was now residing in the Brethren's settlement at Zeist, in Holland.

This company sailed from London on the 17th of May, 1752, and on the last day of July entered a fine bay on the coast of Labrador, which, in honour to one of the owners of the ship, is still called Nisbet's Haven. Here they resolved to settle, and for this purpose erected a house, the frame and materials of which they brought with them. They called the place Hopedale. A few weeks after Erhard sailed farther to the north, for the purpose of trade. He could make himself tolerably understood by the Esquimaux; and as they were afraid to come on board, on account of the guns, he and five of the crew went, in an unarmed boat, into a bay between the islands. Here they were probably all murdered by the savages. As the captain had not another boat, no search could be made for them at that time; but on the return of the ship the next season, some of their remains were found, with evident marks of their having been murdered. This melancholy event obliged the captain to represent to those four brethren, who had come out as missionaries, that having lost six of his men, he could not return to Europe, unless they would consent to go with him, and assist in working the ship. Though they deeply regretted the necessity, yet, under existing circumstances, they could not refuse his request. The ship sailed again to the coast the following year; and the house was found still standing, but it was not deemed expedient to renew the mission at that time.

The undertaking, however, though relinquished for a few years, was never lost sight of. Jens Haven, a missionary in Greenland, and acquainted with the language of that country, who, before he went thither in 1758, had cherished an ardent desire for the conversion of the Esquimaux, was induced again to offer his services for this enterprize. His offer being accepted by the directors of the missions, he came to England in 1764. After many fruitless attempts to attain his object, he was at length recommended to the governor of Newfoundland, Sir Hugh Palliser, who received him with great kindness, and offered him a passage on board his own ship. This, however, was declined by Haven, who only requested a letter of recommendation to the governor of St. John's. This being readily complied with, he went with the first ship sailing for that colony. The governor immediately on his arrival issued a proclamation in his favour, stating the object of his voyage to Labrador, and ordering that every assistance should be given him.* After various delays and vexations, he at length landed on the coast of Labrador, at Quirpont, where he arrived just in time to prevent a murderous plot. Some people had collected there, and were holding a council for the purpose of destroying the Esquimaux. He went boldly up to them, showed the governor's proclamation, and, though not without difficulty, succeeded in diverting them from their barbarous design.

* The reason assigned for this is, that the north-west wind, which is the severest, comes over an arm of the sea to our settlements in Greenland, by which means the cold is lessened: on the contrary, this severe wind, which prevails the greater part of winter in Labrador, comes to that coast over an immense frozen continent.—Brief Account of Mission among Esquimaux Indians.

His first interview with the natives afforded him the liveliest joy, as appears from his own narrative. "September 4th, 1761," saith he, "was the welcome day when I saw an Esquimaux arrive in the harbour. I ran to meet him, addressed him in the most friendly manner in the Greenlandic language, and to my inexpressible joy found he understood me. I desired him to return, and bring four of the chiefs of his tribe with him, to which he readily consented. Meanwhile I put on my Greenlandic dress, and met them on the beach, inviting them to come on shore. They cried, 'Here is an Innuit (a countryman of ours.') I answered, 'I am your countryman and friend.' They seemed astonished, behaved very quietly, and I continued the conversation for a long time. At length they desired me to accompany them to an island, about an hour's row from the shore, adding, that there I should find their wives and children, who would receive me as a friend. This appeared rather a hazardous undertaking, but conceiving it to be of essential service to the missionary cause that I should venture my life amongst them, and endeavour to become better acquainted with their nation, I confidently turned to the Lord in prayer, and thought within myself, 'I will go with them in thy name; if they kill me, my work on earth will be done, and I shall live with thee, but if they spare my life, I shall firmly believe it to be thy will that they should hear and embrace the gospel.' I accordingly went, and as soon as we arrived there, all set up a shout, our friend is come. They carried me on shore and beset me so closely on all sides, that I could neither stir nor turn. Having prevailed on them to place themselves in rows before me, I explained to them my object in coming to visit them, promising, that if they were willing to be taught, I would return next spring with more of my brethren, build a house on their land, and daily discourse with them of the way to life and happiness."

Having had much agreeable conversation with them, Haven returned to Quirpont, where he stayed about a fortnight, and several times preached to the crew of the vessel. On his arrival at Newfoundland, Sir H. Palliser and the Board of Trade expressed their entire approbation of his proceedings, and their wish soon to see a mission established there. Haven, therefore, made a second voyage to that country the ensuing year, accompanied by Christian Laurence Drachart, formerly one of the Danish missionaries in Greenland, and two other brethren. They penetrated farther into the interior; and on their return to the English ships, met with several hundred Esquimaux, to whom they preached the gospel, not without apparent impression. Greatly, however, as the formation of a mission in this country was desired, not only by the Brethren, but also by several persons of rank in England, various difficulties for some years impeded its establishment.

During this season of suspense some Esquimaux came, in 1768, to Chateau bay and renewed their practices of robbing and murdering. They were attacked by a party of English; some were killed, others made prisoners and carried to Newfoundland. Three of the latter, a woman and her two sons, the one about thirteen and the other six years of age, were brought to England. The elder of these two boys, whose name was Karpik, was presented by Sir H. Palliser to the Brethren's Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen. He possessed great vivacity, quickness of apprehension and docility, and, though he was at times rather sullen and obstinate, showed in general many good qualities. Being placed in the Brethren's school at Fulneck in Yorkshire, he was taught reading and writing, in which he attained considerable proficiency. The instructions he received on religious subjects likewise made a salutary impression on his mind; he was often greatly affected, and would ask many pertinent questions. Here he was taken ill with the small-pox. During this sickness he was, according to his earnest request, made partaker of holy baptism. The ceremony was performed in the Esquimaux language by one of the missionaries, then waiting to proceed to Labrador. Soon after, in the year 1769, he departed this life, calling on the name of the Lord. Our brethren greatly regretted this event, because it disappointed their hopes of seeing this youth become a useful servant of Jesus among his countrymen.

His mother, Mikak, was treated with great kindness in England, and received many favours from some of the royal family and other persons of distinction. Her joy was great at meeting with the missionary Haven, as he could converse with her in her native tongue. She importuned him to return and help her poor countrymen, whom she described as being in the most ruinous condition. Her repeated applications to those persons in power, by whom she was noticed, had considerable influence in forwarding the projected mission. The consequence was, that, on the report of the Board of Trade to the Privy Council, a resolution was taken in favour of the establishment of a mission in Labrador; and on the eighth of May, 1769, an order in council was issued to this effect: "That the land in Esquimaux bay, desired by the Unitas Fratrum should be granted to them and their Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen; and they be protected in their laudable undertaking."

Every facility being thus afforded by government for establishing a mission on this coast, some of our brethren in London and other places formed a company, in order to fit out a ship to convey the missionaries to Labrador, and make an annual voyage thither for the purpose of supplying them with provisions, and carrying on a trade with the natives. They purchased a brig of about a hundred and twenty tons burden. In her the three missionaries, Jens Haven, Lawrence Drachart and Stephen Jensen sailed to Labrador in 1770, merely for the purpose of exploring the coast, and fixing on a proper spot where to build. They landed on an island, where they met with a number of Esquimaux, who behaved with great insolence, till awed by the report of the ship's guns. A couple of days after, they again ventured to go on shore, met the natives in a friendly manner, and preached the gospel to them. In sailing from the island to the main land, though but a distance of a few miles, having to pass between a number of islets and concealed rocks along an unknown coast, without chart or pilot, they were exposed to great danger; but were mercifully preserved, and safely reached a harbour on the eastern extremity of the continent, to which they gave the name of Unity Harbour. Having discovered a piece of land near this harbour, suitable for a missionary settlement, they found the Esquimaux not only willing to sell it to them, but very desirous that a company of brethren might come and take possession of it. Filled with gratitude to the Lord, who had so graciously prospered their enterprize, they returned to England, to spend the winter in making the needful preparations for carrying their design into full effect. During this interval, brother Haven married, and the offer of several other brethren, besides those mentioned above, to join the mission, was accepted with humble thanks to the Lord for inclining so many of his people to sacrifice all the comforts of civilized society, and venture themselves among savages, where, besides a thousand other hardships, they might be hourly exposed to perish in their very attempts to humanize these wretched barbarians, and teach them the knowledge of God our Saviour. The whole company consisted of three married couples, a widower and seven single brethren, in all fourteen persons; some of whom went out as assistants to the mission for managing its external concerns. In this company was also a physician. Having in a solemn meeting in the Brethren's chapel in Fetter-lane been commended to the grace of God, they left London on the 8th of May, 1771, and sailed in the brig Amity, for Labrador, touching at St. John's in Newfoundland. Their voyage was tedious, and the latter part of it rendered hazardous, as frequent storms obliged them to run into unknown bays, where they were often environed with large fields and mountains of ice. They however reached the coast in safety on the 9th of August.

* This proclamation contains the following sentence, "Hitherto the Esquimaux have been considered in no other light than as thieves and murderers, but as Mr. Haven has formed the laudable plan of not only uniting these people with the English nation, but also of instructing them in the Christian religion; I require, by virtue of the power delegated to me, that all men, whomsoever it may concern, lend him all the assistance in their power."—Brief Account of Mission among Esquimaux Indians.

The next day they went on shore at the place chosen by Haven the preceding year, and immediately commenced erecting their house, the entire frame of which, together with bricks and every other requisite, they had brought with them from England; and towards the end of September the building was so far completed, that they could inhabit two rooms. They surrounded it with pallisades; for as one of them writes, "their situation was critical, it was as if each with one of his hands wrought in the work and with the other held a weapon;" for they found it needful to be constantly upon their guard against a nation to whom robbery and murder had become habitual. These apprehensions were, however, at this time needless, for they soon discovered a striking difference in the disposition of the natives now, and at their first visit to them. Formerly they were bold and impudent, looked upon the Europeans as dogs, and called them barbarians, while they styled themselves men; but now they were quiet and modest, expressed their desire to hear the good news, and of their own accord showed that they had no deadly weapons secreted either in their clothes or kajaks.

The place our missionaries chose for their habitation, and to which they gave the name of Nain, is so situated, that both the Nuenguak tribe, who reside in the islands, and the other Esquimaux, who usually travel from the south to the north, can pass through the settlement.

The missionaries improved every opportunity for preaching to the natives, especially brother Drachart. who was the greatest proficient in the language, and devoted himself wholly to this work. The Esquimaux generally listened to it with silence and expressed their astonishment. And though a few treated it with contempt, yet in some instances there was good reason to hope that the seed of the word would not remain wholly unproductive. Notwithstanding the excessive cold in winter, some of them ventured to cross the ice and snow in order to visit the heathen, who entertained them very hospitably, and they. in their turn, in great numbers visited at the mission settlement.

This friendly intercourse between the missionaries and the natives was attended at least with this good effect, that the latter gained such confidence towards our brethren, that they asked their advice in all difficult cases, and even chose them as arbitrators in their disputes, forming a resolution among themselves, in future, to refer all their differences to the missionaries, and submit to their decision. The fame of the settlement and its inhabitants spread far into the country, as the following occurrence will serve to show. The Rev. P. E. Layritz, agreeably to the wish of the directors of the mission, undertook a visitation to this new establishment in 1773. As the sloop in which he and his company were was approaching the southern side of the coast, near Camp island, several of the inhabitants met them in their boats in the most friendly and peaceable manner, though the tribe, occupying this part of the country, was formerly considered the most savage, thievish and murderous. They invited brother Layritz and his company to come on shore, listened with eager attention to his discourse, which was interpreted by the missionary Beck, and promised to visit Nain. in order to hear more of these good words. Some of them had been there last winter, and they now declared that brother Drachart had told them the very same words.

During this visitation Lieutenant Curtis was sent by the governor of Newfoundland to survey the coast, and to inquire into the situation of our brethren. At his desire the heads of families, about thirty in number, were convened, and informed that the governor had given orders, that all who were guilty of murdering or stealing, should in future be punished with death, and that none of them should go to the south without acquainting the missionaries with it, and obtaining a certificate from them. To these orders they promised willing obedience, and added: "It is right that a murderer, or thief, be punished with death, for he deserves it; but since we have heard the gospel of Jesus, we have neither murdered nor stolen, and we will not do it any more in future."

The missionaries observed with pleasure, that the confidence and attachment of the Esquimaux to them increased more and more. When they undertook a journey they committed their most valuable commodities to their care, and even left their wives and children under their guardianship. This induced our brethren to build a store-house for them, where they might lay up provisions against the winter, and thus be able to reside with them during that season, and daily hear the word of God.

Although at the close of the second year of their residence among them they could not discover clear evidences of real conversion in any of them, so as to render them proper subjects for baptism, yet appearances even then encouraged pleasing hopes for the future. Many of those dwelling near Nain were much affected during the sermon, and expressed profound awe and reverence for the name of Jesus; but it was difficult to convince them of the evil of sin, and the innate depravity of the heart. Their moral habits, however, were considerably ameliorated. Formerly no European would have ventured to be alone with the Esquimaux, or spend a night with them on any consideration; but now the missionaries often passed several days and nights successively with them, preached the gospel, boldly reproved them, and even silenced the angekoks, or sorcerers, while performing their superstitious rites and incantations. These of course employed all their diabolical arts to prevent their countrymen from receiving the gospel.

This rendered the following occurrence the more remarkable. A man, whose name was Anauke, departed this life, calling on the name of Jesus. The first time the missionaries saw him at Chateau-bay, four years before, he had all the appearance of a thief and murderer; but, after hearing the gospel several times, so striking a change took place in him, that his very features lost their ferocity. In 1772 he pitched his tent at Nain, and stayed there till November, when he removed to his winter house; but some time after returned on foot,* with no other view than to hear the gospel. As it is impossible to travel during the first months of winter, they heard nothing of Anauke till his wife came to the settlement in February, and related, "that when her husband fell sick in December, he prayed earnestly to the Saviour, and not only showed no fear of death, but even declared, that he had no wish to live any longer in this world, but would rather go to his Saviour." When his wife, observing his end to be approaching, began to howl and cry, according to the custom of the heathen, exclaiming, "O my dear husband, wilt thou leave me and thy two children?" he calmly replied, "Weep not, I go to the Saviour who loves men so much." He would not suffer an angekock† to come near him during his sickness. This is the more striking, as he had no Christian friend at hand to instruct him, and none were present whom he might wish to please by speaking of Jesus. The angekock himself related it to the missionary with considerable displeasure. The deceased was ever after known among the natives by the appellation of the man whom the Saviour took to himself.

This occurrence encouraged the missionaries to select from among their hearers such as appeared the most seriously impressed with divine truths, and to form them into a class of Catechumens, in order to give them more particular instructions, and to prepare them for holy baptism. They also resolved to erect a proper chapel, as the room in their house, hitherto used for their meetings of worship, was not sufficiently large to accommodate their hearers, which occasionally amounted to some hundreds.

They likewise began to build boats, and make various implements and utensils for the Esquimaux, hoping thereby to introduce a degree of civilization among them, to prevent their going to the south to steal boats, and also to lessen the expenses of the mission, by bartering these articles to the natives for whalebone and blubber.

In the year 1774 four of the missionaries undertook a voyage for the purpose of exploring the coast to the north of Naim. This expedition was attended with most melancholy consequences. After enduring incredible disasters and escaping many imminent dangers, they suffered shipwreck on their return, the vessel being driven on a rock, where she remained fixed, and finally broke to pieces. After a most anxious night, they early the next morning betook themselves to the boat. This was likewise dashed against the rocks. Two of them, the brethren Brasen and Lehman lost their lives; the other two, Haven and Lister, together with the sailors, saved themselves by swimming, and reached a barren rock. Here they suffered incredibly from hunger and excessive cold, and must inevitably have perished, had they not found it practicable to draw the boat on the rock, and so far repair the damage she had sustained as, on the fourth day after their shipwreck, to venture again into her. The wind was in their favour; and they were providentially observed by an Esquimaux in his kajak, who towed them into the harbour of Nain.

* This is strong evidence of his eagerness to hear the gospel, as the Esquimaux are not accustomed to travel on foot; in summer they go in their boats, and in winter on sledges.

† These sorcerers are also the physicians of the Esquimaux, and make use of certain spells and incantations for the recovery of their patients.

Unappalled by this calamity, Haven and Lister, accompanied by brother Beck, the following spring ventured on another reconnoitering voyage along the south coast, penetrating as far as Old Hopedale; and after some search, found a place near Avertok, more eligible for a missionary settlement than any yet discovered.

But, before the directors of our missions could consider the expediency of occupying this station, they had commissioned brother Haven to begin a new settlement at Okkak, about one hundred and fifty miles to the north of Nain. Accompanied by brother Stephen Jensen, he proceeded thither in the summer of 1775. They purchased the land from the Esquimaux, fixed the boundaries of it, and the following year established themselves in this place. They immediately began to preach the gospel to the heathen in the neighbourhood; and though the progress of conversion here, as well as at Nain, was but slow, yet it was sufficient to preserve the zeal and animate the hope of the missionaries. In 1781 there belonged to the congregation at Okkak, thirty-eight baptized Esquimaux, and about ten catechumens.

In the year 1782, two of the missionaries experienced a very striking preservation of their lives.

Early on March the 11th, the brethren Liebisch and Turner left Nain to go to Okkak, a journey of one hundred and fifty miles. They travelled in a sledge drawn by dogs, and another sledge with Esquimaux joined them; the whole party consisting of five men, one woman and a child. Every thing seemed to favour the undertaking; the weather was fine and remarkably serene, and the track over the frozen sea was in the best order, so that they travelled at the rate of six or seven miles an hour. All, therefore, were in good spirits, hoping to reach Okkak in two or three days. Having passed the islands in the bay, they kept at a considerable distance from the shore, both to gain the smoothest part of the ice, and to avoid the high and rocky promontory of Kiglapeit. About eight o'clock, they met a sledge with Esquimaux driving towards the land, who obscurely intimated that it might be well not to proceed. But as our missionaries saw no reason for it, they paid no regard to these hints, and went on. In a while, however, their own Esquimaux remarked that there was a swell under the ice. It was then hardly perceptible, except on applying the ear close to the ice, when a hollow, grating and roaring noise was heard, as if ascending from the abyss. The weather remained clear, except towards the east, where a bank of light clouds, interspersed with some dark streaks, appeared. But as the wind blew hard from the northwest, no sudden change of weather was expected. The sun had now reached his height, and there was as yet little or no alteration in the appearance of the sky. But the motion of the sea under the ice had grown so perceptible as rather to alarm the travellers, and they began to think it prudent to keep closer to the shore. The ice in many places had fissures and cracks, some of which formed chasms of one or two feet wide; but as they are not uncommon even in the best state, and the dogs easily leap over them, the sledge following without danger, they are terrible only to new-comers.

As soon as the sun declined, the wind increased and rose to a storm, the bank of clouds from the east began to ascend, and the dark streaks put themselves in motion against the wind. The snow was driven about by partial whirlwinds, both on the ice and from off the peaks of the high mountains, and filled the air. At the same time the swell had increased so much, that its effects upon the ice became very extraordinary and alarming. The sledges, instead of gliding along smoothly upon an even surface, sometimes ran with violence after the dogs, and shortly after seemed with difficulty to ascend the rising hill, as the elasticity of the vast body of ice, of many leagues square, and in some places three or four yards in thickness, supported by a troubled sea, occasioned an undulatory motion, not unlike that of a sheet of paper accommodating itself to the surface of a rippling stream. Noises caused by the bursting of the ice at a distance, and resembling the report of cannon, were now likewise heard in many directions.

The Esquimaux, therefore, drove with all haste towards the shore, intending to take up their night-quarters on the south side of the Nirak. But, as it plainly appeared the ice would break and disperse in the open sea, Mark, (who drove the sledge of the missionaries,) advised to push forward to the north of the Nirak, from whence he hoped the track to Okkak might still remain entire. To this proposal the company agreed; but when the sledges approached the coast, the prospect before them was truly terrific. The ice having broken loose from the rocks, was forced up and down, grinding and breaking into a thousand pieces against the precipices, with a tremendous noise, which, added to the raging of the wind, and the snow driving about in the air, nearly deprived the travellers of the power of hearing or seeing any thing distinctly.

To make the land at any risk was now the only hope left; but it was with the utmost difficulty the affrighted dogs could be forced forward, the whole body of the ice sinking frequently below the rocks, then rising above them. As the only moment to land was that when the ice gained the level of the coast, the attempt was extremely nice and hazardous. However, by God's mercy, it succeeded; both sledges gained the shore, and were drawn up the beach, though with much difficulty.

The travellers had hardly time to reflect with gratitude to God on their safety, when that part of the ice from which they had just now made good their landing, burst asunder, and the water, forcing itself from below, covered and precipitated it into the sea. In an instant, as if by a signal given, the whole mass of ice, extending for several miles from the coast, and as far as the eye could reach, burst, and was overwhelmed by the rolling waves. The sight was tremendous and awfully grand; the large fields of ice, raising themselves out of the water, striking against each other, and plunging into the deep, with a violence not to be described, and a noise like the discharge of innumerable batteries of heavy guns. The darkness of the night, the roaring of the wind and sea, and the dashing of the waves and ice against the rocks, filled the travellers with sensations of awe and horror, and almost deprived them of the power of utterance. They stood overwhelmed with astonishment at their miraculous escape, and even the heathen Esquimaux expressed gratitude to God for their deliverance.

The Esquimaux now began to build a snow-house, about thirty paces from the beach; but before they had finished their work, the waves reached the place where the sledges were secured, and they were with difficulty saved from being washed into the sea.

About nine o'clock all of them crept into the snow-house, thanking God for this place of refuge; for the wind was piercingly cold, and so violent, that it required great strength to stand against it.

Before they entered this habitation they could not help once more turning their eyes to the sea, which was now free from ice. They beheld with horror, mingled with gratitude for their safety, the enormous waves driving furiously before the wind, like huge castles, and approaching the shore, where, with dreadful noise, they dashed against the rocks, foaming and filling the air with spray. The whole company now got their supper; and having sung an evening hymn in the Esquimaux language, about ten o'clock lay down to rest. The Esquimaux were soon fast asleep, but brother Liebisch could not get any rest, partly on account of the dreadful roaring of the wind, and partly owing to a sore throat, which gave him much pain.

The wakefulness of the missionary proved the deliverance of the whole party from sudden destruction. About two o'clock in the morning, brother Liebisch perceived some salt water dropping from the roof of the snow-house upon his lips. On a sudden, a tremendous surf broke close to the house, discharging a quantity of water into it; a second soon followed, and carried away the slab of snow placed as a door before the entrance. The missionaries having roused the sleeping Esquimaux, they instantly set to work. One of them with a knife cut a passage through the side of the house; and each seizing some part of the baggage, threw it out on a higher part of the beach; brother Turner assisting them. Brother Liebisch and the woman and child fled to a neighbouring eminence. The latter were wrapped up by the Esquimaux in a large skin, and the former took shelter behind a rock, for it was impossible to stand against the wind, snow and sleet. Scarcely had the company retreated, when an enormous wave carried away their now forsaken habitation.

They thus found themselves a second time delivered from the most imminent danger of death; but the remaining part of the night, before the Esquimaux could seek and find another and safer place for a snow-house, were hours of great distress. Before the day dawned, the Esquimaux cut a hole in a large drift of snow, to serve as a shelter to the woman and child and the two missionaries. Brother Liebisch, however, owing to the pain in his throat, could not bear the closeness of the air, and was obliged to sit down at the entrance, being covered with skins to guard him against the cold.

As soon as it was light they built another snow-house; and, miserable as such an accommodation must be, they were glad and thankful to creep into it.

The missionaries had taken but a small stock of provisions with them, merely sufficient for the short journey to Okkak. Joel, his wife and child, and Kassigiak, the sorcerer, had nothing. They were obliged, therefore, to divide the small stock into daily portions, especially as there appeared no hopes of soon quitting this place or reaching any dwellings. Only two days were left for this purpose, either to attempt the land passage across the wild and unfrequented mountain of Kiglapeit, or wait for a new ice-track over the sea, which it might require much time to form. They therefore resolved to serve out no more than a biscuit and a half per day to each. The missionaries remained in the snow-house, and every day endeavoured to boil so much water over their lamps as might supply them with two cups of coffee a-piece. Through mercy they were preserved in good health, and quite unexpectedly brother Liebisch recovered of his sore throat on the first day. The Esquimaux also kept up their spirits, and even Kassigiak, though a wild heathen, declared that it was proper to be thankful that they were still alive; adding, that if they had remained a little longer on the ice yesterday, all their bones would have been broken in a short time.

Towards noon of the 13th, the weather cleared up, and the sea was seen, as far as the eye could reach, quite clear and free from ice. Mark and Joel went up the hill to reconnoitre, and returned with the disagreeable news, that not a single piece of ice was to be seen in any direction, and that it had been forced away even from the coast at Nuasornak. They were, therefore, of opinion, that they could do nothing but force their way across the mountain of Kiglapeit.

Towards evening, some flakes of ice were observed driving towards the coast; and on the 14th, in the morning, the sea was covered with them. But the weather being very stormy, the Esquimaux could not quit the snow-house, which made them very low-spirited and melancholy. Kassigiak suggested, that it would be well to attempt to make good weather, by which he meant to practise his art as a sorcerer. This the missionaries opposed, telling him that his heathenish practices were of no use, but that the weather would become favourable as soon as it should please God. The weather continuing extremely boisterous, the Esquimaux were ready to sink under their disappointment. They, however, possess one advantage, namely, the power of going to sleep when they please; and, if need be, they sleep for days and nights together.

In the evening of the 15th the sky became clear, and their hopes revived. Mark and Joel went out to reconnoitre, and reported that the ice had acquired a considerable degree of solidity, and might soon afford a safe passage. The poor dogs had now fasted nearly four days; but in the prospect of a speedy release, the missionaries allowed to each a few morsels of food. The temperature of the air having been rather mild, it occasioned a new source of distress; for by the warm exhalations of the inhabitants, the roof of the snow-house began to melt, which occasioned a continual dropping, and by degrees made every thing soaking wet. The missionaries considered this the greatest hardship they had to endure, for they had not a dry thread about them, nor a dry place to lie in.

On the 16th, early, the sky cleared, but the fine particles of snow were driven about like clouds. Joel and Kassigiak resolved to pursue their journey to Okkak, by the way of Nuasornak, and set out with the wind and snow full in their faces. Mark could not resolve to proceed further north, because in his opinion the violence of the wind must have driven the ice off the coast at Tikkerarsuk, so as to render it impossible to land; but thought he might find a track to the south, and get round Kiglapeit. The missionaries endeavoured to persuade him to follow the above-mentioned company to Okkak, but it was in vain; and they did not feel at liberty to insist upon it, not being sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances. Their present distress dictated the necessity of venturing something to reach the habitations of men, and yet they were rather afraid of passing over the newly frozen sea, under Kiglapeit, and could not determine what to do. Brother Turner went again with Mark to examine the ice, and both seemed satisfied that it had acquired sufficient strength. They therefore came to a final resolution to return to Nain, committing themselves to the protection of the Lord.

Notwithstanding the wind had considerably increased, accompanied with heavy showers of snow and sleet, they ventured to set off at half-past ten o'clock in the forenoon of the 17th. Mark ran all the way round Kiglapeit before the sledge to find a good track; and about one o'clock, through God's mercy, they were out of danger, and reached the bay. Here they found a good track upon smooth ice, and made a meal upon the remnant of their provisions. Thus refreshed, they resolved to proceed without stopping till they reached Nain, where they arrived at twelve o'clock at night.

It may be easily conceived with what gratitude to God the whole family at Nain bade them welcome. During the storm, they had with some dread considered what might be the fate of their brethren, though its violence was not felt as much there as on a coast unprotected by any islands. Added to this, the hints of the Esquimaux had considerably increased their apprehensions for their safety, and their fears began to get the better of their hopes. All, therefore, joined most fervently in praise and thanksgiving to God, for this signal deliverance.

The ensuing summer the Brethren began a third missionary establishment on the coast to the south of Nain, which they called Hopedale. For this purpose they purchased from the Esquimaux that tract of land which had been formerly reconnoitered and deemed peculiarly eligible for a settlement. They were encouraged to this extension of their labours in consequence of the eagerness then manifested by the heathen in that vicinity to hear the gospel, and in the fond hope, that by this means a communication might be opened between them and the so-called Red Indians, who live in the interior, and now and then approach the coast in small parties. This latter object, however, has hitherto remained unattainable. And even with respect to the Esquimaux themselves, our missionaries had several years to deplore their rejection of the gospel, so that in 1790 it even appeared as if they had entirely withdrawn from these parts. This unpromising state of things led both the missionaries and the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the heathen, to consider the expediency of relinquishing this settlement altogether. The Lord, however, directed otherwise; and in the sequel, Hopedale was the very place where the new awakening among the Esquimaux commenced, and from thence spread to the other two settlements.

In 1790 many horrid murders were committed in the north. The natives fell upon each other in their tents by night, and numbers were massacred in the most barbarous manner. Amidst the alarm which this event spread through the country, our missionaries were not a little encouraged by the remarks made by the Esquimaux who resided on their land. They expressed their gratitude that the Brethren had settled in the country, adding, "As many murders would certainly have been committed here if you had not come and brought us the good news of our Creator and Redeemer, of his love to us, and our duty to love him and our neighbour."

About six years after, our brethren had a very trying period. An epidemical disease broke out among the natives, and raged through the whole country for some months. All the settlements were visited by it, and it attacked not only the Esquimaux, but also the Europeans; in their case, however, its violence was considerably mitigated. They were obliged for several weeks almost totally to suspend their usual meetings for worship, as the Esquimaux could not leave their dwellings. It proved a source of great grief to them, to find that some of their people, when the medicine administered did not immediately produce the desired effect, had recourse to their old heathenish and superstitious practices for recovery. With few exceptions, however, they afterwards confessed their sinful deviations, and, with every mark of true penitency, begged to be reconciled to the congregation. In the settlements the disorder was not generally fatal, only three or four dying in consequence of it; but among the heathen its violence was greater and the deaths more frequent. Notwithstanding their excessive dread of death, the gospel as yet found no entrance among them. They indeed acknowledged the necessity of conversion, if they would have any solid hope of happiness beyond the grave; but the impression was soon effaced, and they seldom came near the missionaries.

During this period the Esquimaux, William Tuglavina, and his wife, Mikak, died at Nain; the latter in 1795, and the former in 1799. They had been noted characters, both among their countrymen and at the mission. Mikak, who, during her visit in London, was instrumental in promoting the establishment of the mission, continued to render essential services to the missionaries on their arrival in Labrador in 1771, and for some time was an attentive hearer of the gospel. Expressing an apparently sincere desire to obtain true conversion of heart, she was admitted to the class of candidates for baptism. But removing soon after to the south, she lost her good impressions, relapsed into heathenism, and seldom came near our brethren. The last ten days of her life she spent in Nain, where she was faithfully attended by one of the missionaries. Her declaration and conduct were such as to encourage the hope that she had found mercy with God our Saviour.

Of her husband, the missionaries give the following account: "Tuglavina, now called William, was from the beginning well acquainted with the missionaries. He was a man of great note among the Esquimaux, and acquired extraordinary influence and power, not only by his activity, dexterity and success in hunting, his courage, bodily strength and hardiness, which are considered the most essential qualifications of a great man among the Indians, but also by remarkable strength of mind, and quickness of understanding, far superior to that of most of his countrymen. He took advantage of their credulity and general mental inferiority, to gain an astonishing ascendancy over them; and his word was absolute law. As a sorcerer, he was believed to have extraordinary powers given him by the Torngak, or familiar spirit, whom he pretended to consult on all occasions; and so little did the poor deluded savages mistrust his inspirations, that it has often happened, that if he declared, on the word of his Torngak, that such an one ought not to live, the wretched object of his vengeance was instantly murdered by the company. Thus he not only became guilty of the murder of several persons by his own hands, but of many more through his influence and insinuations. The missionaries would have fallen an easy prey to his murderous disposition, had God permitted him to disapprove of their settling in the country. But, though a tyrant among his own nation, and in various ways a great disturber of the peace of the mission, and the seducer of many converts, he always respected and even loved the missionaries. He would submit and even tremble in their presence, whenever reproved for his bad conduct; always confessing that he ought to be converted, and to forsake the ways of sin.

"As an instance of his submission to the missionaries, brother Haven mentions in one of his reports, that when Tuglavina, at the head of a party of Esquimaux, returned the first time from Chateau Bay, having furnished himself with a sloop of two masts, European arms, and many other accoutrements, he stepped unexpectedly into the Mission-House, and into brother Haven's room, dressed in an old officer's uniform, with a bob-wig and a huge laced hat, a sword to his side, and altogether in the habit of an European officer, uttering several threats, and boasting of his valiant deeds in the south. Brother Haven looking sternly at him, exclaimed, 'What, are you Tuglavina? depart this minute; I have nothing to say to you in this dress; put on your old Esquimaux furs, and then return; behave like a sober Esquimaux, and I'll answer your speech.' Tuglavina instantly left the room, as if thunderstruck; and without reflecting on the degrading appearance he must make before his countrymen, in putting off his boasted ornaments, returned to the missionaries, dressed in the plain Esquimaux fashion, who then very seriously reproved him for the wicked practices and the murders of which he had been guilty, and for inveigling so many of the baptized to follow him to the south, where he had seduced them into all manner of heathenish abominations. During this address, Tuglavina grew pale, trembled exceedingly, confessed himself an abominable sinner; but said that he must sin, for the devil forced him to it, and he could not help himself. This gave the missionary a desirable opportunity of preaching unto him Jesus as an Almighty Saviour. Such opportunities became more frequent in the following years; and he often shed tears when confessing his wicked deeds, which, contrary to the general practice of the Equimaux, he never denied. In the sequel he became more attentive to the gospel, did every thing in his power to serve the missionaries, and though often hurried into the commission of sin, and by his great reputation among his countrymen, beguiled into conceit, and prevented from humbling himself under the mighty hand of God, yet it was apparent that the Lord followed him, to make him a monument of infinite mercy. At length he gave such proofs of his sincerity and firm resolution to turn with his whole heart unto the Lord, and forsake the ways and even the conversation of the heathen, that our brethren could not but consider this sinner, though so heavily laden with the most enormous crimes, an object of God's mercy and pardon, and a candidate for eternal life. After the usual time of trial as an inhabitant of the settlement, and many serious conversations, and much previous instruction, he was received into the fellowship of the believers, on Christmas day 1793; renouncing the devil and all his works, and promising, with heart and hand, to devote himself unto that God, who made and bought him with his precious blood. He had already during a dangerous illness been baptized in Chateau Bay by a Presbyterian minister.

"After his admission to the Lord's Supper his conduct and expressions of gratitude for all the mercies bestowed upon him, proved very pleasing and encouraging to the missionaries. He evinced a cordial interest in the conversion of his countrymen, and frequently addressed them on the concerns of their souls with such earnestness as no Esquimaux had ever done before. The following year, however, he relapsed, and his conduct was so grossly offensive, that it became necessary to exclude him from the Lord's table for some time, till he showed, not only by his words, but by his whole behaviour, that he sincerely repented of his deviation. In his last illness, he declared, 'that he was ready to go to Jesus, and hoped that the Saviour would not reject him.' He repeatedly testified, 'that he was happy, and put his trust in God our Saviour alone.' As his bodily pain increased, he frequently called on the Lord to release him and take him to himself. He was about sixty years of age when he died."

Towards the close of 1800 an event occurred at Hopedale of the most melancholy nature. The missionary J. W. Reiman, having gone out on the 2d of December to procure some fresh provisions by shooting, returned no more, and as no one was with him, his brethren could only conjecture, that he must have lost his life by the ice breaking under him. This conjecture received additional probability from the account given by four Esquimaux, who, when he did not return in the evening, went in search of him, and continued the search the whole night. They reported that by the light of the moon, they could discern the marks of his feet in several places, but lost them again when they came to the ice. As soon as it was light the next morning the missionaries, accompanied by all the Esquimaux, set off to make a general search, and were favoured with the continuance of fine weather; but their search was as fruitless as that of the preceding night. They keenly felt the loss of him; nor could any thing assuage their grief but the divine consolations with which they were graciously favoured.

In the diary of Hopedale, of 1803, a pleasing instance is related of the mild and forgiving spirit of the gospel. In a conversation which took place among some of the converts, in the presence of a missionary, many disputes were amicably settled, and quarrels prevented. They showed a readiness to confess their grievances and faults to each other, and a sincere disposition mutually to forgive and forget them, and begin anew to bear with each other in the spirit of true brotherly love. "This circumstance was the more striking," say the missionaries, "as the custom of the Esquimaux is, to suppress their displeasure, and even to feign indifference on receiving injuries; but to watch an opportunity for revenge, which, if no earlier opportunity presents itself, breaks out in the most diabolical and murderous retaliation, perhaps ten or twelve years after the offence has been given."

The following horrible incident forms a melancholy contrast to the benign influence of religion just mentioned. Intelligence was brought to our missionaries at Okkak, in January 1806, from Kivalek, that the old sorcerer, Uiverunna, had spent the winter there, he and his family being the only residents. Here his wife died, upon which the old monster seized a poor orphan child, whom he had formerly adopted. Having murdered it, he cut it across all the joints of the fingers and toes, ripped open the belly and threw the body naked into the sea. "Though we are not acquainted with his motives for so atrocious an act," write the missionaries, "yet we know that it belongs to that system of diabolical incantations, by which he expects to appease the devil, by whom he pretends to do great wonders, but who now, according to his notions, required a greater sacrifice than usual, as he had not saved the life of his wife." He did not long escape the punishment he so amply deserved. Having of late endeavoured to render himself formidable among the heathen, by making them believe he had power to kill whomsover he pleased, as he never failed, when any died, to have it reported, that he had sent them out of the world by his torngak, or familiar spirit; and being also known as an old murderer, many had resolved to kill him as soon as a fit opportunity should offer. Among other lies he some time ago pretended, that by his sorceries he had killed Kugalek's two wives, who died on one day. Ever since Kugalek sought for revenge; and being joined by another man, they succeeded in dispatching the old sorcerer, shortly after the above act of infanticide.

Hitherto the conversion of the heathen in Labrador had not only proceeded very slowly, but had been attended with many discouraging circumstances. The missionaries had patiently persevered in preaching to the natives, and watching every opportunity to make them attentive to the best interests of their souls; but had reaped little fruit from their labours. Visits were frequent, and there was in general no want of hearers to address, but they showed no disposition to be instructed. If even a salutary impression was occasionally made on their minds, it was not abiding. Some families were indeed collected in the different settlements, but after staying there during the winter, they mostly moved away again in summer, and apparently forgot all they had heard. A few had been baptized and admitted to the Lord's table, yet even these caused the missionaries more grief than pleasure. They had no power to resist the temptations placed in their way, when associating with the heathen during their summer excursions. This often obliged the missionaries to exclude them from the fellowship of the believers. In case of sickness, they were but too ready to have recourse to the superstitious tricks of sorcerers. Even those who refrained from superstitious practices, and were moral in their general deportment, had no true life of God in their souls. They might in some degree observe the form of godliness, but were destitute of its power.

One principal impediment to the progress of the mission was the practice of the Esquimaux, especially those at Hopedale, to go to the south to purchase fire-arms and other articles from the Europeans. Here they associated with the heathen and soon relapsed into their former impious practices. However, as a scarcity began to prevail in that quarter, in consequence of which many perished of hunger, a stop was at length put to these rovings.

This was the state of the mission at the beginning of 1801; but before the close of that year a new period commenced. A fire from the Lord was kindled among the Esquimaux, accompanied with the clearest evidence of being the effect of divine operations on their hearts. It commenced at Hopedale, the very place which presented the most discouraging prospect.

When the Esquimaux of that place returned from their summer excursions, the missionaries were delighted to find that they not only had been preserved from sinful practices, but had greatly increased in the knowledge of divine truth. They had obtained an humbling insight into the corruption and deceitfulness of their hearts, and the wretched state of a person void of faith in Christ. This constrained them to cry for mercy, and gladly to accept salvation on the terms of the gospel: and some afforded encouraging hopes, that they had found forgiveness of sins in the blood of Christ, by which their souls were filled with peace in believing. Out of the abundance of the heart their mouths spake of the love and power of Jesus. Their artless, but energetic, declarations impressed the rest of the inhabitants. They began to feel the necessity of true conversion; and in a short time all the adults appeared earnestly to seek peace with God. Even several of the children were awakened. Our missionaries were daily visited by people, who either inquired, "what they must do to be saved?" or testified of the grace of God manifested to their souls.

The work of conversion, thus begun at Hopedale, soon spread to Nain, and was promoted by rather a singular occurrence. Two young men, Siksigak and Kapik, whose parents were members of this congregation, went to Hopedale, where the mother-in-law of the former resided. His intention was to convey his wife back to his mother, and marry another, who promised to second him in every heathenish abomination, and to forsake the Christian Esquimaux altogether. This man, on entering his own mother's house at Hopedale, found the family engaged in their evening devotion. They did not suffer themselves to be disturbed by his arrival; he sat down, quite astonished at what he saw and heard, being ignorant of what they were doing. The whole company earnestly entreated him not to part from his wife, but pray for true conversion of heart. To these entreaties the missionaries added their exhortations; but all to no purpose; he persisted in his determination. His relations, finding that advice and persuasions had no effect, resorted to prayer. The following day they all assembled in his mother's house, and, in his presence, joined in fervent supplications for his conversion. His mother, among the rest, uttered this petition: "O Lord Jesus! behold this my child; I now give him up to Thee; O, accept him, and suffer him not to be lost forever!" A scene, so unprecedented and unexpected, had an instantaneous effect on the young man; he evidenced a real concern for his salvation, and his whole heart appeared changed: he desisted from his wicked purpose, and took his wife back, and became an humble inquirer after divine truth; to whom the Lord afterwards showed great mercy. His companion, Kapik, also was powerfully awakened, by the instrumentality of his relations.

On their return to Nain, these two men, with energy and boldness, preached Jesus to their countrymen. Some of their friends heard them with astonishment, others mocked and hated them; but the impression made on the inhabitants of the settlement was pleasing and permanent. "We saw several of our people," say the missionaries, "by degrees yielding to conviction, and beginning to doubt whether their Christianity were of the right kind, and whether they had not been deceiving themselves and others. They came voluntarily and confessed their sins, some with many tears, and in a manner of which we had had no instances before. The more seriously they reflected on their former life, the more deeply were they convinced of the treachery of their hearts; they wept on account of the deceit they had so often practised, and confessed to us things of which we could have formed no conception. Though we could not but feel pain on account of their former hypocrisy, our grief was counterbalanced by the joy we felt at the amazing power of our Saviour's grace, by which their hearts were thus broken and softened. Our faith, which in some cases, was indeed very weak, revived, and we saw clearly that with God nothing is impossible."

The news of these pleasing events at Hopedale and Nain soon spread to Okkak, followed by similar effects. The work of conviction and conversion here was greatly promoted by visits of the Christian Esquimaux from Nain. These visitors showed such an ardent desire to describe to their countrymen the love and mercy of God, which they had so savingly experienced themselves, that they went from tent to tent, testifying of the love of Jesus to sinners in so impressive and affecting a manner, that their hearers could resist no longer, but came to the missionaries and confessed the dangerous state of their souls, earnestly inquiring what they must do to be saved. Even the heathen visitors from the north, who passed through the settlement, were struck. They frequently called on the missionaries, and of their own accord came to the chapel and listened to the gospel with silence and much apparent devotion. They expressed their regret that they lived at such a great distance, and could not conveniently remove from their native country, but said, if the missionaries could come to them, they would gladly receive instruction. Many of the heathen also, living in the neighbourhood of our brethren, were so astonished at the occurrences among their believing countrymen, that they resolved to move to one or other of the settlements.

The progress of the mission in the sequel supplies sufficient proof, that this effect of the gospel was not a wild fire, or the mere consequence of a momentary impression, but a divine work, wrought in the hearts of the natives by the Spirit of God himself. The missionaries frequently mention the attention and diligence shown in the schools, both by adults and children, and the delight and fervour with which they engage in their family devotions and in conversations with each other respecting the influence of the gospel on their own souls. Their behaviour at public worship likewise very strikingly differed from that of former years, with regard to the eagerness with which they now attended the house of God, and their deportment during the performance of divine service. On one occasion the missionaries remark, "We no longer see bold, undaunted heathen sitting before us, with defiance or ridicule in their looks; but people expecting a blessing, desirous of experiencing the power of the word of life, shedding tears of repentance, and their whole appearance evincing devotion and earnest inquiry."

Whenever any heathen Esquimaux obtained permission to live on the land belonging to our brethren, their Christian countrymen manifested the purest joy. The following occurrence, related in the report from Hopedale of 1805, will serve to confirm this assertion. "As soon as it was known that some heathen had obtained leave to stay, there arose among our Esquimaux such a spirit of joy and gladness, that it was truly affecting to witness it. Since their arrival here, our people had not failed to speak of the mercy which the Lord had shown in their own conversion, and to preach Jesus to them as the only Saviour, who alone could make them happy both here and hereafter; and now, on being informed that they were to be inhabitants of the place, they hardly knew how to contain themselves for joy. Young and old ran to help them with their baggage, and to settle their little affairs. It happened also, that early in the morning, a party of heathen Esquimaux, who had declared that they would not live with the believers, on departing, had left a man with his wife and child behind, who refused to follow the heathen any longer, and begged to be permitted to live here. He had pitched his tent at some distance, but our people, filled with love and ardour to serve all those who manifested a sincere desire of being converted, went immediately, took it down, and set it up in the midst of their own dwellings. The new comers were quite humbled and amazed by such proofs of love and attention on the part of their Christian countrymen, and declared, that for the first time in their lives they had found people who loved them with disinterested sincerity."

A proof, no less striking, of the transforming influence of the gospel, appeared in the readiness of the believing Esquimaux to abandon those superstitious habits and practices, to which they are apt to cling to the very last. A woman, who had been called Magdalene at her baptism, resisted many temptations put in her way by her husband. Having formerly been very ailing, the heathen used to give her a variety of charms and amulets which she wore about her clothes, whenever she went to sea. In the summer of 1806, being ready to set out on a voyage with her husband, she threw them into the water, saying to the whole company: "Now we shall see whether there is a Jesus who can save and preserve us in health without this trumpery." She enjoyed remarkably good health during the whole voyage; which greatly confirmed her previous convictions of the sinfulness of her past life, and her resolution to devote herself entirely to the Lord. Nor was this a solitary instance; the cases were now becoming less frequent every year, in which, in consequence of their having been seduced to heathen superstitions during their summer residence at a distance from the settlement, the missionaries found themselves compelled to exclude any of the converts from church-fellowship; a circumstance which in the early period of the mission caused them so much sorrow and perplexity.

In 1811 the settlement at Hopedale suffered considerable diminution. A very unusual disorder broke out among the natives, of which the missionaries give the following account: "Our Esquimaux had been for a long time preserved from any particular illnesses, except being subject to a kind of eruption and boils, which, however, though painful and unpleasant, were rather beneficial to their general health. But on the 24th of July, as a boat filled with our people was leaving Tikkerarsuk, one of their provision-places, to return to Hopedale, several of them, one after the other, were seized with a nervous paralytic disorder of a most dangerous and deadly nature, insomuch that, during the next eight days, thirteen of them departed this life, of whom seven were communicants. Three of them were fishing in perfect health in the morning, and in the evening lay as corpses in the boat. Above thirty were taken ill, and some brought nigh unto death, but now, thank God, the greater number have recovered, though a few are still very weak. As late as the 12th of September, we buried an old communicant, called Luke. Terror and dismay seized the people, but we confidently believe, that those who departed this life are now in the presence of Him whom they had known here as their Saviour, and to whose holy will they expressed full resignation at the approach of death. By this afflicting dispensation we have now got a considerable number of widows and orphans, depending entirely upon charity, and we cannot withhold from them occasional assistance. We often commend them in prayer to the Father of the fatherless, who will in mercy regard and supply their wants."

The missionaries had not been long settled in Labrador, before they discovered that the coast was very thinly inhabited. They consequently conceived that the aim of the mission would be better attained, if access could be had to the main body of the nation, from which the roving Esquimaux on the coast appear to be mere stragglers. In this opinion they were confirmed by those heathen who annually visited the settlements, and who reported that the body of the Esquimaux nation lived near, and beyond, Cape Chudleigh. These visiters conceived much friendship for the missionaries, never failed to request that some of them would come to their country, and even urged the formation of a new settlement, considerably to the north of Okkak.

In order to determine the practicability of thus extending the labours of our brethren in Labrador, the directors of the missions, after nature deliberation, recommended them to undertake a voyage for the purpose of exploring the northern coast, which had hitherto remained unknown to European navigators.

The missionaries Kohlmeister and Kmoch cheerfully engaged in this difficult and perilous enterprise, for which they were well qualified. The latter, to other essential qualifications, joined great cheerfulness and intrepidity. The former, having resided seventeen years in Ladrador, was complete master of the language, and deservedly beloved both by the Christain and heathen Esquimaux; and his kind and affable manner was eminently calculated to conciliate the affections of unknown pagans, while his invincible zeal to promote their temporal and spiritual welfare sustained his mind in every difficulty and danger. He had besides acquired some knowledge of mineralogy, botany, the use of the quadrant and other sciences, which might be of advantage on such an expedition.

They engaged the Christian Esquimaux, Jonathan, of Hopedale, who possessed a two-masted shallop, for a liberal recompense, to conduct them on their voyage. He was a man of superior understanding and skill, and of uncommon presence of mind in difficulties and dangers. At Hopedale he was considered the principal person, or chief, of his nation. On his part it was no small sacrifice to accompany the missionaries, for though an Esquimaux roves a good deal during the summer in quest of food, yet in winter he always, if possible, settles in his native place, where he is esteemed and beloved. But Jonathan was willing to relinquish all these comforts, to reside among strangers where he would have no preeminence, and expose himself to unknown hardships and dangers, uncertain whether he should ever return, sustained only by the hope that the projected voyage might pave the way for the introduction of the gospel into that quarter. When any of his countrymen represented to him the danger of the expedition, he used to say, "Well, we will try; we shall know better when we get there." Once he said, "When I hear people talk about the danger of being killed, I think, Jesus died out of love to us, what great matter would it be, if we were to be put to death in his service, should that be his good pleasure concerning us." Nor did he ever, during the whole voyage, forsake that generous principle, but his cheerful, firm and faithful conduct under all circumstances proved most honourable to the character of a convert to Christianity.

Besides the missionaries and the captain, our travellers were joined by the family of the latter, and three other Esquimaux families from Hopedale, and a fifth from Okkak, who attended the shallop in a skin-boat. The whole company, therefore, consisted of nineteen persons, among whom were several young children. They all met at Okkak, and waited there till the bay was cleared of ice.

Having freighted the vessel with the things necessary for the voyage, the travellers were commended to the grace and protection of God in a meeting of the congregation at Okkak, on the evening of the 23d of June 1811.

At two o'clock the following afternoon they weighed anchor, and for several days proceeded without any remarkable occurrence. The sea being still full of drift-ice, which it required great care to avoid, they mostly approached the shore at night and cast anchor. They frequently met with companies of Esquimaux from Okkak and other places, who had their summer-station along the coast. With these the missionaries held meetings for worship, whenever circumstances permitted, especially on Sundays.

Proceeding in a northerly direction, the travellers found their passage completely occupied with floating ice, driving towards them and forcing them to return. This brought them into great distress, so that the captain himself repeatedly exclaimed in a plaintive tone: "Alas, alas, we shall soon be without a boat!" With the utmost difficulty they sailed along the shore, some being obliged to land and haul the boat with ropes round the points, and others with hooks and spars to keep her off the rocks. Two or three times she stuck fast on sunken rocks, but by God's mercy was got off again without being damaged. At length they got into Nullatartok bay, in the 59th degree of north latitude. It is surrounded by high mountains, and so shallow at the upper end, that no large ice-fields can float in it. Here they pitched their tents and were detained twelve days, during which time they explored the country as far as they were able. The mountains were covered with moss, alder, birch, and various shrubs and plants; and the valleys with grass and a great variety of flowers. The rocks were slaty, easily splitting into plates of from four to eight feet square. They discovered three rivers abounding in salmon.

The sea being at length cleared of ice, they embarked again, on July the 15th, and steered towards Nachvak bay, the magnificent mountains of which afforded them a most enchanting prospect, especially at sun-rise. A party of heathen Esquimaux, about fifty in number, had fixed their summer residence on this bay. As soon as our voyagers approached, loud shouts of joy resounded from all quarters, and muskets were fired in every direction. They had scarce patience to wait for their landing, and were all eager to assist them in pitching their tents. Their behaviour was modest and rather bashful, and there was no reason to complain of any unpleasant intrusion; nor were any thefts committed. They rested here two days, and did not neglect to acquaint the heathen with the design of their voyage, and to preach the gospel to them. They were evidently much impressed, and one of their chief men said: "I am determined to be converted to Jesus." The Christian Esquimaux, in the travelling company, were likewise very zealous in exhorting their countrymen to believe in Jesus, and on every occasion exhibited the character of true believers.

On the 25th of July they arrived at Oppernavik, lying between the 60th and 61st degree of north latitude, not far from Cape Chudleigh. Here they found Uttakiyok, with his two wives and youngest brother, waiting for them. He and his family are from the Ungava bay, the very place to which they were directing their course. He was one of the two Esquimaux, from whom our missionaries received the first distinct information respecting the Ungava country and its inhabitants. Having learned that it was the intention of our brethren to make a voyage to that country in the present year, he had waited for their arrival in Oppernavik during the whole spring, and had erected signals on all the heights surrounding his tent, that they might not miss him. This man was of very essential service to them, as without such a steady and trusty guide, they must have been wandering in the most painful and perilous uncertainty in the desert regions to the west of Cape Chudleigh, where, on a coast of one hundred miles in length, they did not meet a single inhabitant. He executed the office he had thus voluntarily undertaken, with a degree of faithfulness and disinterested kindness, which excited their admiration and gratitude.

After enduring much fear and difficulty on the first of August from large shoals of ice surrounding them on all sides, they safely passed the whirlpools and eddies in the straits, and doubled Cape Chudleigh without meeting with any disaster, except that the skin-boat, which they had in tow, with an Esquimaux in her, was seized by the vortex and received a rapid twist: but as the towing-rope did not break, she was immediately, by the swiftness of their course, rescued from danger.

Having thus entered the ocean on the western side of Cape Chudleigh, they found themselves, as it were, transported into a new world. The coast, which had hitherto taken a northerly direction, now turned to the south-south-west. They soon got sight of the Ungava country, and sailed briskly amidst the numerous island, lying along the coast, which is low, with gently sloping hills. They discovered three skin-boats, full of people, standing towards them from the shore. They were inhabitants of Ungava, and welcomed them with shouts of joy, and with firing their pieces. The missionaries visited them in their tents, informing them of the purpose for which they had undertaken this voyage. As many of these Esquimaux had never before seen an European, they did not know how to satisfy their curiosity with gazing at them, and even felt them all over.

August 7th they arrived at the mouth of the river of Kangerthualuksoak, to which they afterwards gave the name of George's-river. To this spot they had from the first directed their attention. It lies about 140 miles S. S. W. of Cape Chudleigh, in lat. 58° 57′ North. Here they pitched their tents and stayed several days, for the purpose of exploring the country. At a short distance from their landing place they discovered a spot which appeared well adapted for a missionary station. It is a green slope, or terrace, overgrown with shrubs, a woody valley extending on one side. Their conductor, Uttakiyok, who had spent more than one winter in the Ungava country, assured them that there was here an ample supply of provisions, both in summer and winter, for the Esquimaux, and expressed his conviction that they would collect from all parts and settle here, if a missionary establishment were formed. As to Europeans, the missionaries entertained no doubt that they might find means of subsistence in this place, as it is accessible for ships, and has wood and water in plenty. These considerations induced them to erect high marks of stones, on the two opposite hills at the entrance of the bay; and on a declivity of a hill on the right they fixed a board, in which were carved the initials of the present King of Great Britain, those of the two missionaries, and of the society to which they belonged, together with the day and year of their arrival.

Our travellers, after leaving this place, had proceeded but a short way, when they were obliged to cast anchor in an exposed situation, being detained several days by contrary winds: and when the wind became more favourable, it blew so hard a gale, that they were in imminent danger of suffering shipwreck. Their situation now became critical and rather alarming. The season was far advanced, and the Esquimaux expressed their fears, that if they proceeded much farther, they might not find it practicable to return to Okkak before winter, which would be attended with most distressing consequences.

These circumstances threw the missionaries into a very perplexing dilemma. They were only seventy or eighty miles distant from the western extremity of the Ungava country, which they had fixed upon as the final object of their voyage, and yet difficulties now presented themselves, which seemed to render it nearly impossible to reach this point. In this perplexity they retired to their own tent, and, having maturely weighed all circumstances, entreated the Lord's direction in fervent prayer. They rose from their knees with a firm conviction in their minds, that they ought to proceed in His name, relying on his help. And when they mentioned their determination to the Esquimaux, they found them cheerfully disposed to prosecute the voyage.

Two days after the wind veered to the north-east, and became favourable, so that after a sail of six days they arrived at the mouth of the river Kocksoak (Sand-river,) the very place they had in view. Here they remained from August the 25th to the 1st of September, exploring the circumjacent country, and entering into conversation with the inhabitants respecting the object of this expedition. The difference between these Esquimaux and their countrymen living in the vicinity of our settlements was very striking. The former are very poor and miserably equipped, whereas the latter, by their intercourse with our brethren and other Europeans, have acquired many conveniences, and even comparative affluence. They appeared rather shy, but, after receiving a few trifling presents, they became more free and communicative, surveying the missionaries from head to foot, as if they were a new species of animals. They listened with attention to their discourses, repeatedly expressing their wish, that they would come and settle in the country, that they might hear more of the gospel and be converted.

The estuary of the Kocksoak lies in 58° 36′ N. latitude, at the distance of from six to seven hundred miles from Okkak, and is about as broad as the Thames at Gravesend. They gave it the name of South-river. Having proceeded further up this river, in the skin-boat, they arrived at a bay, surrounded on all sides by gently rising ground, well wooded with trees of moderate size. They gave it the name of Unity's bay. They considered this a very convenient place for a missionary settlement. A fine slope extends for about half an English mile, bounded on each extremity by a hill, on which they erected high signals. The land is level and dry, well watered by several rivulets issuing from the wood, in which they found various European plants and flowers, different kinds of shrubs, such as junipers, currants, &c. and grass and trees in abundance.

Our travellers now deemed it unnecessary to prosecute their voyage any further, as, from all the intelligence they could gain from the natives, they were satisfied that no other place suitable for a missionary establishment could be found. Further west no wood grows along the coast, and there is no place, except the two rivers before named, where a ship could with safety approach the land; and at this season of the year they would probably meet with no inhabitants, as they were all gone into the interior to hunt reindeer. The object of their expedition having been thus far attained, they prepared for their return. They presented their faithful pilot, Uttakiyok, with their skin-boat, with which he was highly gratified. September the 2d they commenced their voyage home, and without meeting with any remarkable occurrence, arrived in safety at Okkak on the 4th of October, after an absence of fourteen weeks, having performed a voyage of from twelve to thirteen hundred miles.

During the following years no very remarkable events occurred in the three settlements at Hopedale, Nain, and Okkak. The mission proceeded with a slow but steady pace, and though the accession of new converts was not great, yet our brethren had the pleasure to find that, with but few exceptions, those who came to reside with them, remained faithful to their promise on admission, to forsake their pagan customs, and improve all the means of grace for true conversion of heart. They were cheered in their benevolent exertions by observing clear evidences of a divine work in the children and young people, born and educated in the settlements. They were stimulated to increasing diligence at school by obtaining a new spelling and reading-book in the Esquimaux language. The progress of both young and old in scriptural knowledge was greatly promoted by the translation and printing of the Harmony of the Four Gospels, the Summary of Christian Doctrine for the use of the children, and the subsequent version of each of the gospels separately, generously published at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The devotion of the congregation has been much enlivened by the publication of a Hymn Book in their native tongue.

The early commencement and extraordinary severity of the winter of 1815 prevented the Esquimaux from procuring a sufficient stock of provisions; they were, however, preserved from absolute famine, as the missionaries rendered them all the assistance which their own scanty stores allowed. This distress had in some measure an injurious influence on their spiritual course, as they were obliged to seek their food at a distance from the settlements. Some were so reduced by want and distress, that they seemed in a manner stupified, and scarce able to attend to the concerns of their souls with becoming seriousness. Many of them, however, manifested filial confidence in their heavenly Father, and due resignation to his will. Notwithstanding these trying circumstances the missionaries remark: "It is clearly seen, that the Christian Esquimaux have a consciousness of the necessity of knowing and relying on their Saviour and Redeemer, whom they are bound to love and serve; and often have we seen them shed tears on hearing the gospel. The conduct of our communicants has afforded us pleasure and edification, by which we have been greatly encouraged. In short, we rejoice in perceiving, that the work of God and his Spirit has been carried on in the hearts of our people, with manifest blessing, though amidst much weakness and imperfection on our part, and not distinguished by any extraordinary appearances from without."

A trial, severer than any which had hitherto exercised the faith and patience of our brethren on this coast, was experienced by them in the year 1816, in consequence of the late arrival of the ship at Nain and Okkak, and the complete failure of all the captain's attempts to reach the settlement at Hopedale. The following is the official account of this disastrous event: "October 28th, 1816, the Jemima arrived in the river from Labrador, after one of the most dangerous and fatiguing voyages ever known. She arrived at the drift-ice on the Labrador coast on the 16th of July. Captain Fraser found it extending two hundred miles from the land, and after attempting to get in, first at Hopedale, then at Nain, and lastly at Okkak, he was at length completely surrounded by ice, and in the most imminent danger during six days and nights, expecting every moment that the ship would be crushed to pieces; with very great exertion he at length got towards the outer part of the ice. Yet he was beset by it for forty-nine days, and to the astonishment of all our brethren, as well as the Esquimaux, did not reach Okkak till August 29th. The very next day the whole coast, as far as the eye could reach, was entirely choaked up by ice, and after lying at Okkak nearly three weeks, he was twice forced back by it on his passage to Nain, which place he did not reach till Sept. 22d. After staying the usual time, Captain Fraser proceeded, Oct. 3d, towards Hopedale, though with fine weather, yet, on account of the lateness of the season and a great deal of drift-ice, with but little prospect of reaching that settlement. Notwithstanding he mentioned his fears to the brethren at Nain, brother Kmoch and his wife, and the two brethren Korner and Christensen, who were going to Hopedale, went on board, and they set sail. In the evening the wind rose and blew very hard, accompanied with a heavy fall of snow, and so dense a fog, that they could not see the length of the ship. Being within half a mile of a dangerous reef of rocks, the captain was obliged to carry a press of sail to clear them, which he did but just accomplish, when the gale increased to such a degree, the wind being right on shore, that he was obliged to lay to, when the sea often broke over the vessel. Seeing every attempt to reach Hopedale was in vain, he was at last necessitated to bear away for England on Oct. 5th. On the 8th, 9th, and 10th, he again experienced a gale, equal to a hurricane, which, during the night between the 9th and 10th, was so violent, that the captain expected the ship would have foundered. She was at one time struck by a sea, which twisted her in such a manner, that the very seams of her larboard side opened, and the water gushed into the cabin, and into the mate's berth, as if it came from a pump, and every body at first thought her side was stove in; the Lord, however, protected every one from harm, and nothing was lost, nor has the ship suffered material damage."*

This disastrous event occasioned many fears and perplexities, both to the missionaries in Labrador and their brethren and friends at home. It caused a very considerable expense to the funds of the society. It unexpectedly removed four missionaries from the scene of their labours. And it awakened the most painful feelings in our brethren and sisters at Hopedale, who naturally concluded that the ship had been lost, as a considerable time elapsed before they heard of her arrival at the other two settlements; and even then their anxiety was but partially relieved, being inclined to fear that the vessel had foundered in attempting to reach their harbour.

The four missionaries, who had thus unexpectedly been brought to Europe, after spending the winter in England, returned to Labrador in 1817. Their voyage was perilous, as the passage was frequently obstructed by immense fields of ice during heavy gales and thick fogs. But, though the vessel was greatly damaged, she safely reached the harbour of Hopedale; and, after receiving the needful repairs, proceeded to Nain and Okkak.

From the intelligence, brought by the ship on her return to England, the author is able to lay before his readers the following concise account of occurrences in this mission down to the autumn of 1817.

The non-arrival of the ship at Hopedale in the preceding year had, as was anticipated, caused much anxiety to the missionaries in that place. They had, however, suffered no want of provisions, being supplied from the stores at Nain.

The most distressing consequence of the event just alluded to, was the obstacle, thereby thrown in the way of our brethren in Okkak, to proceed during the summer of 1817 to the Ungava country, and spend the following winter there. But the unexpected removal of the missionaries to Europe so reduced the number of those remaining in the country, that they were obliged, though very reluctantly, to relinquish that intention. This was the more to be regretted, as they had received previous information that the inhabitants of the Ungava country were anxiously awaiting their arrival. But time and seasons are in the hands of the Lord; "He does all things well," and the duty of his servants is, "under every trial to be resigned to his will."

* Per. Acct. Vol. VI. p. 270.—It deserves to be gratefully acknowledged, that this is the first calamity of this kind, experienced by our brethren since their arrival in Labrador. The ship, freighted for the purposes mentioned in page 507, had made forty-seven voyages to and from this coast, without suffering any serious disaster. Though some fears for her safety had been excited once or twice before, the issue was such, as to awaken gratitude rather than repining sensations. In 1778 the vessel was captured by a French privateer; but as it happened on her return, it was attended with no detriment to the missionaries; and being soon after recaptured by the English, she was restored to the owners. The captain, mate and two sailors, who had been taken to Dunkirk, were soon liberated, and all the letters and papers from Labrador transmitted unopened to our brethren in London. On her return in 1805 she escaped a similar danger. On the 18th of November she was chased by a French frigate, brought to, and forced to keep her company. But the sea running very high, and continuing in that state for twenty-four hours, it was impossible for the frigate to send out a boat to board her. The second night proving extremely dark and boisterous the captain, setting as much sail as the ship would carry, ventured to attempt his escape, and in the morning saw no more of the frigate. Two days after, however, he had the mortification to meet her again, and to be brought to a second time. Again the Lord interposed. The wind was so violent, that the frigate could not put out a boat, and during the night the captain, crowding all the sails, fortunately escaped and saw no more of the enemy. On her voyage from Nain to Okkak in 1811 the mercy of God in her preservation was thankfully acknowledged by all on board. The cold was so intense, though only the latter end of September, that the running rigging, being covered with ice, would not work through the blocks, and had it been needful, the sails once set, could not have been handed. Even the sails were stiffened by the frost, so as to be quite unmanageable. But it pleased God to grant such favourable wind and weather, that nothing was required but to steer the vessel. On reaching Okkak, on the 29th of September, the sailors were obliged to go aloft and knock off the ice and furl the sails. On her return to England she encountered storms little short of hurricanes; and though she sustained considerable damage, the captain did not deem it necessary to put in for repairs any where, and reached London in safety on the second of December.

The peaceful and hopeful course of the Christian Esquimaux was unhappily disturbed by some pagan visiters from the south, who inveigled eighteen of the inhabitants of Hopedale and fifty of Okkak to leave the settlements, and remove with them to the residence of the Europeans in the south. Discouraging as this was to our brethren, they were animated in the prosecution of their work, by observing, that the major part of their converts were progressively attaining more of the Christian character, both in knowledge and practice.

A few general observations will very properly close this chapter. The mission in Labrador, in many respects, bears a strong resemblance to that in Greenland. Most of the converts pass the winter in the settlements, dwelling in winter-houses; but the greater part of the summer they spend in their provision-places on the islands, or along the coast, catching seals, or in the interior hunting reindeer; and when during this season they come, for a week or two, to the settlements, they dwell in their tents. During the winter the meetings for religious worship, not only on Sundays, but every day in the week, and likewise the schools, both for adults and children, are held in regular order.

Our brethren have laid out gardens, which, however, do not produce much except lettuce, spinnach, and a few early turnips and cabbages. The country supplies them with some game, such as hares, wild geese, partridges, &c., and the bays furnish plenty of fish; in some years they have even caught more than 6000 large salmon-trouts at Nain, which, together with cod, are prepared for winter's use. But, after all, their main subsistence must depend on the provisions annually sent from Europe. It is no wonder, therefore, that the arrival of the ship is always considered as a most auspicious event, and never fails to awaken the liveliest joy and gratitude.

They have one convenience not possessed in Greenland. The country supplies not only wood for fuel, but also timber for most purposes of building. With a view to facilitate their necessary labours of this kind, they have erected a saw-mill in each of the settlements.

CHAPTER III.

MISSION IN NORTH AMERICA.

The Trustees of Georgia having offered Count Zinzendorf a tract of land to be colonized by the Brethren, this offer was gladly accepted, in the hope that a way might thus be opened for preaching the gospel to the Creek, Chickasaw and Cherokee Indians.

A number of brethren being found willing to engage in this undertaking, they left Herrnhut in November, 1731, conducted by John Toeltschig and Anthony Seiffart, and being joined in London by brother Spangenberg,* arrived in America the following spring. The Trustees of Georgia accommodated them with houses in the town of Savannah, till they had cleared and cultivated a piece of ground and formed a settlement on the river Ogache. Their number being increased the following year by several new colonists, God blessed their endeavours in such a manner, that in a short time, besides maintaining themselves and assisting their neighbours, they were able to repay the money advanced for them in London. Among their neighbours they bore the character of peaceable, quiet and pious people, who were not seeking temporal advantages, but merely the salvation of the heathen.

In the hope of thereby attaining their object, they erected a house for a school on the island of Irene, in the river of Savannah, about five miles from the town. Many Indians resided on that island, and most of them understood some English. Here the missionaries, P. Rose and his wife, Seiffart and Biener took up their abode, preached to the Indians, and instructed their children. The Reverend Benjamin Ingham, an English clergyman, having come from Georgia, lodged with them for some time, and rendered them important services, particularly in studying the language of the Indians.

Their labours here, however, were soon interrupted. The Spaniards endeavouring to expel the English from Georgia, the Brethren were called upon to join the other colonists in taking up arms against them. This they refused, having before their arrival obtained a legal exemption from personal military service. But, as their refusal displeased the rest of the inhabitants, they repaid all the money advanced to them, left their flourishing plantations, and retired to Pennsylvania.

Being unwilling totally to relinquish this promising field of labour, they availed themselves of the offer of the Rev. George Whitfield to assist him in his establishment in Georgia, and for this purpose sent brother John Hagen thither in 1740. But all the men of the Creek Indians having gone to the war against the Spaniards, he could not effect much, and therefore returned to Pennsylvania.

Brother Spangenberg had meanwhile visited Germany, and excited such a lively interest in the Indian mission, that several brethren resolved to venture their lives in this benevolent but arduous service. One of these, Christian Rauch, was immediately despatched to New York, where he arrived in July, 1740. Some pious people endeavoured to dissuade him from his intention, representing it as a fruitless and dangerous enterprize; but his zeal and confidence in God were not shaken.

Having heard that an embassy of Mahikans were in the city, he went in search of them, and to his great joy he found that they understood the Dutch language. Their appearance was ferocious, and they were besides much intoxicated. When they had become sober, he addressed two of them, Tschoop and Shabash, inquiring, whether they wished for a teacher to instruct them in the way of salvation? They approved of his proposal, and with due Indian solemnity declared him their teacher. At a subsequent interview, arrangements were made for his removal to the Indian town Shekomeko, about twenty-five miles east of North River, on the borders of Connecticut.

When Rauch arrived at the residence of these Indians, they received him with great kindness, and listened to his first address with marks of serious attention; but, when he repeated his exhortations the next day, they derided his words, and openly laughed him to scorn. Not discouraged by their taunts, he was indefatigable in visiting them in their huts, testifying of the evil of sin and of the grace of God in Christ Jesus. On these occasions, he had to encounter many hardships. He had neither the means to keep a horse, nor money to hire a boat, and thus suffered from the excessive heat and fatigue in travelling from one town to another; and he was not unfrequently denied admittance into their houses.

In a while, however, it pleased the Lord to open the ears and hearts of some of them. Tschoop, one of the two Indians whom he had met in New York, was the first who discovered any serious conviction of sin, and a desire to be instructed in the gospel. Soon after, his companion, Shabash, was likewise awakened; and the work of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of these two savages strikingly evidenced itself. Their eyes overflowed with tears when the missionary conversed with them on the sufferings and death of our Redeemer, and the efficacy of his atonement. They lamented their former blindness in worshipping dumb idols, and their ignorance of the true God and the way of salvation.

These proofs of the power and grace of God soon became public. The neighbouring Christians were roused and made attentive to the gospel. They desired the missionary to preach to them, and the Word was blessed to many. In this way he laboured for a whole year, never omitting an opportunity of beseeching and encouraging Christians and heathen to come to Jesus Christ.

But now, some white people, conceiving their interests would be injured if the Indians were converted to Christianity, stirred up the heathen against him, and even instigated them to threaten his life, if he did not leave the place. He therefore deemed it most advisable to remove for a while, and take shelter with a farmer. This man, at first, raised various objections against the conversion of the Indians; but when he observed the zeal and devotedness of the missionary, he offered him board and lodgings in his house upon condition that he should instruct his children, remarking, "We white people are as wicked and ignorant as the heathen."

* He had held the office of Theologus Adjunctus in the university of Halle, in Saxony; and having joined the Brethren, was afterwards consecrated a bishop of their church.

In this family, brother Rauch diligently discharged the duties of a schoolmaster, yet neglecting no opportunity of fulfilling his missionary calling. In the execution of the latter, however, he met with many difficulties and impediments. Some of the white people sought opportunities to maltreat him, even threatening to hang him; others tried to seduce the Indians to inebriety, that they might murder him in a drunken frolic. In short, they employed every artful means to prepossess their minds against him, so that even Tschoop and Shabash became mistrustful. To these wicked machinations, he opposed a meek and peaceable deportment. He was prudent and cautious in all his steps; firmly confiding in his Almighty Protector, he acted with undaunted courage, praying for his enemies, and sowing the word of God in tears.

By degrees, his meek and humble behaviour, his perseverance and courage, gained the admiration of the Indians, and changed their conduct towards him. He went frequently among them, ate and drank with them, and even lay down to sleep in their huts with the greatest composure. This latter circumstance, in particular, excited their astonishment. Tschoop once observing him asleep in his hut, confessed that he was mightily struck, and thought: "This man cannot be a bad man; he fears no evil, not from us who are so savage, but sleeps comfortably, and places his life in our hands." Being, upon further reflection, convinced of the falsehood of the charges brought against the missionary by the white people, he exerted himself to remove the prejudices of his countrymen; and he happily succeeded.

Having thus regained the confidence of the Indians, brother Rauch was unremitting in his labours for their good, and had the joy to observe, that many were powerfully impressed by his discourse of the love of Jesus to sinners. But, in no instance did the Word reach the conscience with greater power, or more strikingly display its saving efficacy, than in the case of Tschoop. Before his conversion, he was distinguished by every act of outrage and sin, and had even crippled himself by his debaucheries; but now the lion was tamed, and the slave of sin and Satan became a child of God and a preacher of righteousness. The account he once gave of his conversion, will best elucidate the change wrought in him. "Brethren," said he, "I have been a heathen, and have grown old amongst them; therefore I know how heathen think. Once a preacher came, and began to explain to us, that there was a God. We answered, 'Dost thou think us so ignorant as not to know that? Return to the place from whence thou camest.' Then again, another preacher came and said: 'You must not steal, nor lie, nor get drunk,' &c. We answered, 'Thou fool, dost thou think us ignorant of this? Learn first thyself, and then teach the people to whom thou belongest, to leave off these things; for who steal, lie, or are more drunken than thine own people?' And thus we dismissed him. After some time, brother Rauch came into my hut, sat down and spoke nearly as follows: 'I am come to you in the name of the Lord of heaven and of earth. He sends to let you know, that he will make you happy, and deliver you from the misery in which you lie at present. For this end he became a man, gave his life a ransom and shed his blood for sinners,' &c. When he had finished his discourse, he lay down, fatigued with his journey, and fell into a sound sleep. I thought, what kind of a man is this? There he lies asleep; I might kill him and throw him into the wood, and who would regard it? But this gives him no concern. However, I could not forget his words; they constantly recurred to my mind. Even when asleep, I dreamt of the blood Christ shed for us. I found this to be widely different from any thing I had heard before; and I interpreted Rauch's words to the other Indians. Thus, through the grace of God, an awakening commenced among us. I say, therefore, brethren, preach Christ our Saviour and his sufferings and death, if you would wish your words to gain entrance among the heathen."*

Count Zinzendorf, being come to America to inspect the various colonies and settlements of the Brethren in that quarter of the world, also visited this infant mission. On this occasion, Tschoop, Shabash, and two other Indians, were admitted to the church of Christ by baptism, as the first fruits of that nation. The count made several journeys into the interior, whereby a friendly intercourse was established with some other Indian tribes. In one place he met with a numerous embassy of sachems, or heads of the Iroquois, to whom he declared the purport of his visit. After about an hour's consultation, two of the ambassadors returned the following answer to the count: "Brother, you have made a long voyage over the seas to preach to the white people and to the Indians. You did not know that we were here, and we knew nothing of you. This proceeds from above. Come, therefore, to us, both you and your brethren; we bid you welcome, and take this fathom of wampum in confirmation of the truth of our words." A kind of league was thus made between the Brethren and the Iroquois, which was at that time of great importance, as they might have considerably obstructed the labours of the missionaries, had they been enemies.

Shekomeko now became a flourishing little town. More missionaries joined brother Rauch, endowed with the same patient fortitude, prudence and ardent zeal, for the conversion of the heathen. The young converts were filled with joy and gratitude for the grace conferred upon them, testifying with a warm heart, both to white people and to Indians, of the love of God in Christ Jesus; and their Christian deportment evidenced the reality of their profession. The gospel found attentive hearers not only in the neighbouring villages, but many savages came from a distance of twenty miles to hear the great word, as they termed it, and were often so much affected during the sermon, that they wept all the time, and some even fell on their faces, and by other expressive attitudes signified how deeply the discourse had penetrated and humbled their hearts.

Meanwhile the other Indian nations were not wholly neglected. Besides the endeavours of Count Zindendorf and the persons in his company, the Brethren at Bethlehem frequently sent some of their number to preach in the Indian towns in their vicinity, which were chiefly inhabited by Delawares. No immediate success attended these endeavours, except that the kind and affable behaviour of the brethren prepossessed the savages in their favour, and thus paved the way for better things at a future period. These journeys were often attended with much fatigue and danger. On one occasion, two brethren were obliged to pass through a forest which had been set on fire, and to cross a large brook, which had overflowed its banks. But the God whom they served delivered them, and literally verified his promise: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."—Isaiah xliii. 2.

In externals, the missionaries had to endure many difficulties and trials. The enmity of many nominal Christians against the work of God among the heathen had not wholly subsided. They met with much opposition, and Satan was continually instigating his emissaries to harass and distress them. They lived and dressed in the Indian manner, so that in travelling they were often taken for Indians. As far as they could, they maintained themselves by the labour of their hands, being assisted by the Brethren in Bethlehem only when their own resources proved insufficient.

As most of the Christian Indians who visited at Skekomeko lived in Pachgatgoch, in Connecticut, at a distance of about twenty miles, they requested the magistrates to provide them with a preacher. Their petition being rejected, they applied to Bethlehem, when brother Mack and his wife were sent thither. They were received with great joy, even by the heathen, who remarked that they must love them very much, to undertake so long a journey in winter. Mack likewise made a journey to Potatik, about seventy miles further in the country. In both places the Lord evidently blessed his labours. Many were awakened to a sense of their lost condition and their need of a Saviour, and six Indians were baptized at the latter place.

The congregation at Shekomeko continued to increase, not only in number, but also in grace and knowledge; but hitherto the missionaries had been scrupulous of admitting any to the Lord's Supper. Now, however, they thought it wrong to debar them any longer from this holy ordinance. Having, therefore, given their converts the needful instruction respecting its institution and the blessings thereby conveyed to true believers, they admitted ten of the Christian Indians to partake with them of this sacred repast in March, 1743; and their number was augmented each succeeding month.

In July, the same year, a new chapel was opened at Shekomeko. It was thirty feet long and twenty broad, and entirely covered with smooth bark. This enabled them to regulate their meetings for worship better. On Sundays and other festival occasions Shekomeko seemed all alive, and it might be said with truth that the believers evidenced their faith in Jesus both early and late. Many heathen visited the place; and once, when above a hundred were there, the missionaries observed, that wherever two or three were standing together, the love of God and the sufferings of Christ formed the subject of their conversation; and such was the zeal of the Christian Indians, that they often testified of Jesus to their countrymen till after midnight.[*] At the request of the inhabitants the missionaries drew up some rules for the regulation of their civil and social intercourse with each other, and for the promotion of good order in the settlement; and they had the pleasure of finding, that whenever any of their converts had been guilty of transgressing these rules, they were ready to acknowledge their misconduct, and to listen to advice and instruction. Thus every thing seemed to flourish at Shekomeko; the number of baptized Indians, at the close of the year, amounted to sixty-three, exclusive of those residing in Pachgatgoch. Besides these, they had a great many constant hearers, some of whom were under serious impressions of divine truth. Brother Mack and his wife now took up their residence at Pachgatgoch, and built themselves a hut of bark after the Indian manner. The wonderful effects produced by the preaching of the gospel in this place, soon roused the attention of the whole neighbourhood. Some white people, who had been accustomed to make the dissolute lives of the Indians subservient to their own advantage, were exceedingly enraged, when they found them unwilling any longer to abet their wicked practices. They, therefore, resorted to every base artifice to seduce them, propagating the grossest calumnies against the missionaries; and as this did not succeed, they persuaded a clergyman of the Church of England to join in their measures. He ordered the Indians to send to New England for a minister and schoolmaster; but they replied that they were perfectly satisfied with the teacher they already had, and requested to enjoy the same religious liberty as all other denominations of Christians in the state did. This answer exasperated the adversaries still more. They publicly stigmatized the Brethren as papists and traitors. The missionaries, Mack, Shaw and Pyrlens, (the two latter being on a visit in Pachgatgoch,) were taken prisoners, and dragged up and down the country for three days. The governor of Connecticut having fully investigated the allegations brought against them, and found them false, they were honourably dismissed. However, as their enemies still continued to harass them, they thought it most prudent to retire for a while to Shekomeko.

* Loskiel, Part II. p. 14. By comparing this relation with that of the conversion of the first Greenlanders, the resemblance will be found truly striking. See pp. 497, 498.

Not to mention several visits, paid about this time to other Indian tribes, it should be here observed, that while, on the one hand, the missionaries had to suffer many hardships and much opposition, they met, on the other, with many proofs of the power of the gospel in "turning the gentiles from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God." In one place, a most savage Indian publicly burned his idols, and in a speech, delivered to his countrymen, lamented his former blindness and ignorance with great energy, and exhorted them to turn to the Lord Jesus.

Hitherto, though exposed to various vexations, they had not met with any serious interruption to their labours; but in the spring of 1744 a violent persecution was raised against them. Some white people continued to employ every artful means to alienate the affection of the Indians from the Brethren, and to seduce them to drunkenness and other vices. They circulated the basest insinuations against the missionaries, representing them as dangerous to the state, pretending that they were in league with the French, and intended to supply the savages with arms to fight against the English. This report, false as it was, spread such terror through the country, that the inhabitants of the neighbouring town of Sharon remained under arms for a whole week, and some even forsook their plantations. The missionaries were now called upon to serve in the militia; but this they refused, on the ground that, as ministers of religion, they ought not to be compelled to bear arms. A second application to the same effect being likewise resisted, they were for several months dragged from one court to another, to be examined and answer to the allegation brought against them. They punctually, though with great inconvenience to themselves and their work, obeyed every summons, and were enabled to disprove, by unimpeachable evidence, every charge brought against them. At the same time they protested against the restriction laid upon them in the prosecution of their missionary calling, and avowed their firm resolution rather to suffer any thing for conscience sake, than disobey God and the lawful authority of the state. The magistrates were satisfied, dismissed them with every mark of respect, and, as a protection against the machinations of their enemies on their return to Shekomeko, they gave them an honourable acquittal in writing.

Their adversaries, finding their scheme frustrated, resorted to other measures. Knowing the conscientious scruples of some of the missionaries against taking an oath, they exerted all their influence to obtain two Acts of Assembly in New York, which were passed in October; the one enjoining all suspicious persons to take the oaths of allegiance, and, in case of refusal, to be expelled the country; the other positively prohibiting the Brethren from instructing the Indians. December the 15th, the sheriff and three justices of the peace arrived at Shekomeko, and, in the name of the governor and council of New York, prohibited all religious meetings, commanding the missionaries to appear before the court on the 17th of that month. On their appearance, the act was read to them, by which they were expelled the country, under the old pretence of being in league with the French.

The injustice of this act was acknowledged by every candid and unprejudiced person. Bishop Spangenberg, who visited this settlement towards the close of the year, makes the following remarks in his journal: "The nearer we approach to Shekomeko, the more veneration we found among all ranks of people for the great work of God in that place. The justice of the peace at Milsey accompanied us, and declared that he would rather suffer his right hand to be cut off, than treat the Brethren conformably to the act passed against them, for he was thoroughly convinced that the grace of God had, by their means, wrought miracles in that place."[*]

The missionaries, however, deemed it not only prudent, but their duty, to obey the lawful authority of the state, and therefore retired with a heavy heart to Bethlehem in Pennsylvania; yet they preserved unshaken confidence in the Lord, that he would himself defend their cause and arise for the help of his oppressed people.

After their removal from Shekomeko, the Christian Indians continued their religious meetings as usual, and were occasionally, though at the risk of persecution, visited by brethren from Bethlehem. Once when a large company was returning to Bethlehem, the circumstance of the wife of one of the missionaries being an Indian woman furnished some ill-disposed justices at Sopus with a pretext for detaining them. They were insulted by the mob, and had to suffer much in the open street from cold and violent rain, and, when at length permitted to proceed, they were loaded with curses and reproaches. On another occasion two brethren were arrested at Albany, and, after enduring many indignities, taken to New York and confined in prison for seven weeks.

Amidst the grief experienced in consequence of these disastrous events, the missionaries were greatly comforted by perceiving that their labour was not in vain in the Lord. Soon after their expulsion from Shekomeko they had the joy to baptize a man and his wife, the first fruits of the gospel among the Delaware nation. This solemn transaction was performed at Bethlehem. Both of them belonging to the family of the chief, their relations were highly displeased, considering the step they had taken as a disgrace to their rank, and, in order to seduce them to apostacy, invited them to their houses; but the two baptized persons, fearing their souls might suffer harm, declined the invitation. Upon this their relations resolved to take them by force, and thirty-six, among whom were several young warriors, came to Bethlehem with this intention. At first they behaved in a very turbulent manner, but, being kindly treated, their anger abated, their countenances softened, and they even entered into conversation with their baptized friends and other Christian Indians. Gottlieb, one of their baptized relatives, gave them a plain account of his reasons for joining the Christians, exhorting them also to believe in the Lord Jesus. During this conversation the savages seemed extremely uneasy, and early the next morning set off on their return. After some time they sent a message to Gottlieb, desiring him to come and instruct them. With this he complied, and had the satisfaction to see his own brother become a believer, and by baptism join the church of Christ.

[*] Mr. Weiser, a justice of the peace in Pennsylvania, bears a pleasing testimony of the grace prevailing at Shekomeko, in a letter written to one of the missionaries after he had visited that place. His words were: "The faith of the Indians in our Lord Jesus Christ, their simplicity and unaffected deportment, their experience of the grace procured for us by the sufferings of Jesus, have impressed my mind with a firm belief, that God is with you. I thought myself seated in a company of primitive Christians. They attended with great gravity and devotion; their eyes were steadily fixed upon their teacher, as if they would eat his words. John [Tschoop] was the interpreter, and acquitted himself in the best manner. I esteem him as a man anointed with grace and spirit. The text of Scripture, Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, appeared to me as an eternal truth, when I beheld the venerable patriarchs of the American Indian church sitting around me, as living witnesses of the power of our Lord Jesus Christ and his atoning sacrifice. Their prayers are had in remembrance in the sight of God; and may God fight against their enemies. May the Almighty give to you and your assistants an open door to the hearts of all the heathen.—Loskiel's History of the Indian Mission, Part II. p. 53.

[*] Loskiel, Part II. p. 64.

Although the state of things at Shekomeko was such as to afford sincere pleasure, yet the suspension of the regular services of the missionaries could not but eventually prove injurious to the congregation. It was, therefore, proposed to the Christian Indians to remove from the province of New York, and settle near Bethlehem, till a more eligible spot could be procured for their future establishment. But, contrary to expectation, the inhabitants of Shekomeko showed themselves averse to this measure, and, among other reasons, alleged, that the governor of New York had expressly commanded them to stay in their own town, promising them his protection; and that, were they even to remove, some of their relations, especially the young, would still remain there and be easily seduced to their former sinful practices. An event, however, occurred soon after, which induced them gladly to accede to the proposal of the Brethren. Some white people came to a resolution to expel the Christian Indians by main force, under pretence that the ground on which Shekomeko stood, belonged to other people. The governor of New York not attending to their petition for his interference, these white people seized upon the land and appointed a watch to prevent all visits from Bethlehem. The old accusations of disloyalty were renewed, and gained so many supporters, that the inhabitants of Reinbeck demanded a warrant of the justice to kill all the Indians at Shekomeko. Though the warrant was not granted, yet the situation of the people there became so very distressing, that they were glad to emigrate.

Ten families of these emigrants, consisting of forty-four persons, arrived at Bethlehem in April, 1746. They immediately built some huts near the settlement, as a temporary residence, to which they gave the name of Friedenshuetten. But as an Indian town could not be supported so near to Bethlehem, the Brethren purchased two hundred acres of land, lying at the junction of the rivers Mahony and Lecha, about thirty miles distant. This situation pleased the Indians, and they immediately began to plant, and lay out a town, calling it Gnadenhuetten. The building of this place was attended with considerable expense and much trouble. The land, being overgrown with wood, had first to be cleared, and the Indians having neither knowledge nor skill in agriculture, the heaviest part of the labour fell upon the missionaries; but they cheerfully endured every fatigue, considering it as done in the service of the Lord.

When intelligence of this new settlement reached Shekomeko and Pachgatgoch, many Indians in those places were induced to remove to it, so that, in a short time, it contained more inhabitants than the two former; and soon became a regular town. The church stood in a valley; on one side, upon rising ground, were the Indian houses, forming a crescent, and on the other the mission-house and the burying-ground. Every Indian family had a plantation. The road to Wayomick and other Indian towns lay through the settlement.

In Shekomeko the prospect appeared daily more precarious. The Indians in league with the French, having made inroads into the country, had advanced within a day's journey of that town, setting fire to the houses and murdering the inhabitants on their way. By these circumstances, and being called upon to join in the war, the Christian Indians, still remaining in that place, were kept in constant fear and anxiety. The Brethren could not come to their assistance till in July, 1746, when Hagan and Post went thither from Bethlehem. It was now found necessary to give up every idea for holding meetings for divine worship in that place, but the chapel was, by a deed of gift, secured to the Indians as their property. Thus the Brethren, with sorrowful hearts, yet praising God, who had first caused the light of the gospel to shine to the heathen in this place, concluded their labours at Shekomeko. Within the space of two years sixty-one adults had been made partakers of holy baptism, exclusive of those baptized at Bethlehem.

During the troubles in Shekomeko, various disorders had occurred among the converts. Some had been seduced to join in sinful practices, and others, through the calumnies of adversaries, had imbibed prejudices against the missionaries. The Brethren, however, had the joy to find, that most of them became sensible of their errors, and with sincere penitence confessed their deviations. Such penitents were received with open arms at Bethlehem and Gnadenhuetten. As an example of the figurative manner in which the Indians generally express themselves, the language of one of these penitents may be quoted: "I am like a child," said he, "whose father loves him dearly, clothes him well, and gives him all he stands in need of; afterwards the child becomes refractory, deserts his parent and despises his counsel. At length, the child, through his folly, loses all the good things he possessed, his clothes become ragged, and nakedness and want follow. Then remembering how well he fared, he repents and weeps day and night, scarcely presuming to return. This is precisely my case."

The Indian congregation at Gnadenhuetten continued for several years in a pleasing course, and increased to about five hundred persons. Besides other useful regulations, schools were established. The place was often visited by heathen, who were often treated with hospitality and kindness, and no means were neglected for directing their attention to the gospel. Nothing, in general, made a deeper impression upon the savages, than the peace and harmony prevailing among the Christian Indians, and their contentment amidst all difficulties. The sincerity of their profession evinced itself in many ways. They diligently attended to their work and the cultivation of their fields, and when necessary for their support, went out to hunt. Their firm confidence in our Saviour showed itself in many trying circumstances. Thus, when the small-pox broke out among them, they bore the sickness with patience, manifesting but little fear of death; and the cheerful and happy disposition of those who departed this life, was truly edifying. Their solicitude for the Christian education of their children was another proof of the change wrought on their minds. Such is the excessive fondness of the Indians for their children, that they hardly ever suffer them to be out of sight; but now many of them, seeing the temptations to which they would be exposed at home, entreated the Brethren, even with tears, to receive them into the schools at Bethlehem; a request willingly acceded to, whenever it was possible.

The labours of the Brethren for the conversion of the Indians at this period, were not confined to Gnadenhuetten. They improved every opportunity that offered for propagating the gospel, and undertook many difficult and perilous journeys. The Iroquois more particularly engaged their attention; to gain entrance among them they made several visits to Shomokin and other towns on the Susquehanna, and by degrees established themselves there. The inhabitants of Shomokin being noted for ferocity and licentiousness, the missionaries witnessed many barbarous and profligate scenes, and were more than once in danger of being murdered by the intoxicated natives. During a journey to Onondago, the chief town of the Iroquois and the seat of the great council, a solemn league, executed with due Indian formalities, was made between the council and the Brethren, by which the latter obtained permission for two of them to reside in that country for the purpose of learning the language. But no permanent advantages were gained by all these exertions.

Their endeavours at other places were more successful, especially at Pachgatgoch and Wechquetank, in the neighbourhood of Shekomeko, where a few Christian Indians, who had not emigrated with the rest, were still residing. The missionary David Bruce was appointed to this station in 1748; and the year after had the pleasure of seeing twenty Indians added to the church by baptism. But that very year he finished his earthly pilgrimage, being succeeded by brother Abraham Buninger. This little flock enjoyed rest and peace for several years, and increased to upwards of a hundred in number.

Meniolagomekah, situated at no great distance from Bethlehem, was another promising station, occupied during this period, where many of the inhabitants became obedient to the gospel. In a few years, however, the white people seized upon their plantations; and as the Brethren could not succeed in making a purchase of the land, their converts were obliged to remove to Gnadenhuetten in 1754.

In the summer of 1752 an embassy of Nantikoks and Shawanose, consisting in all of one hundred and seven persons, arrived at Gnadenhutten, and formed a solemn league of friendship with the Brethren. Another embassy of these tribes, attended by three Iroquois Indians, and consisting of twenty-two persons, came to Gnadenhuetten the following spring, and, to the no small astonishment of the Brethren, proposed to them to quit that settlement and remove to Wayomik, a town belonging to the Shawanose. They assigned no particular reason for this unexpected proposal. It appeared, however, in the sequel, that it was in reality an act of friendship. For as the savages were secretly determined to join the French in hostilities against the English, they wished to furnish a safe retreat to their countrymen of Gnadenhuetten, that they might the more easily fall upon the white people in those parts. In this view the Iroquois had called the Nantikoks from Wayomik into their neighbourhood, to make room for the Christian Indians.

However unpleasant the projected removal was, the Brethren would not interfere in the business, lest the old calumny of intending to enslave the Indians should be revived, and, therefore, left their converts to act entirely as they pleased. After evincing considerable reluctance at quitting their pleasant settlement, and real sorrow at being thus separated from their teachers, upwards of eighty finally determined to remove to Wayomik and Neskopeko. After their arrival in these places, they were occasionally visited by some of the missionaries, who found these poor exiles still walking in the fear of God, and that, by their zealous testimony of Christ and his atonement, they were made a blessing to their heathen countrymen. But their external situation was by no means desirable. All the people residing on the Susquehanna, were in constant fear and terror both of the Catawas and the French. The former being at war with the Iroquois, who made frequent incursions into the country, and the latter threatening the Indians with fire and sword, unless they acted in concert with them against the English. Besides this, the people of New England, who laid claim to Wayomik, were advancing with an intention of seizing the land by force. These circumstances obliged the Indians in 1756 to forsake that town.

The missionaries were still lamenting the emigration of so many of their converts from Gnadenhuetten, when their sorrow was unexpectedly turned into joy, by the arrival of the Indians from Meniolagomekah. This enlivened the congregation at Gnadenhuetten, and animated the native assistants with new zeal and fidelity in the discharge of their duties. Their external troubles, however, did not yet terminate. They had not only a kind of tax imposed upon them, to show their dependence on the Iroquois, but the following very singular message was sent them: "The great head, i. e. the council in Onandago, speak the truth and lie not: they rejoice that some of the believing Indians had moved to Wayomik, but now they lift up the remaining Mahikans and Delawares,* and set them down also in Wayomik; for there a fire is kindled for them, and there they may plant and think on God: but if they will not hear, the great head will come and clean their ears with a red-hot iron (meaning they would set their houses on fire) and shoot them through the head with musquet-balls." The chief of the Shawanose, who delivered this message, then turned to the missionaries, earnestly demanding of them not to hinder their converts from removing to Wayomik.

This message spread general consternation through Gnadenhuetten, especially the concluding address to the missionaries. It was soon discovered that this proposal did not originate in the great council at Onondago, but with the Oneida tribe and the warlike Mahikans and Delawares, aided by some persons of consequence in Philadelphia, who thereby hoped to obtain some sinister end they had in view. The Brethren left the inhabitants of Gnadenhuetten to their free choice, whether to go or stay, only warning them, in an affectionate manner, of the dangers to which their souls might be exposed by their removal. This warning was addressed to them, not without good reason, as some of the baptized had lately relapsed into heathenism, and even become the seducers of others. The address had the desired effect. Most of those, whose conduct had been blameable, ingenuously owned their transgressions, begging forgiveness of the rest, which was granted with joy. The grace of God was, perhaps, never more evident, than in seeing an Indian, naturally obstinate and inflexible to a high degree, appear before a whole body of people as an humbled sinner, and ask pardon of God and those whom he had offended. Thus most of them resolved to stay, and they remained firm to their resolution. When, shortly after, the message was repeated in a more stern tone, an Indian brother said: "What can the chief of the six nations give me in exchange for my soul? They never consider how that will fare at last." Another remarked: "God who made and saved me, can protect me, if he please; I am not afraid of the wrath of man; for not one hair of my head can fall to the ground without His will." And a third observed: "If even one of them should lift up his hatchet against me and say, 'depart from the Lord and the Brethren,' I would not do it."

The congregation at Gnadenhuetten had now a short season of rest, and, walking in the fear of the Lord and the comforts of the Holy Ghost, was edified. The Brethren improved this interval of repose for sending missionaries to preach and administer the sacraments to the Christian Indians residing in other places, and for propagating the gospel among the heathen. These journeys were attended with many dangers; but they thought themselves richly compensated by finding their converts in most places walking worthily of the gospel, and by the accession of new members to the church.

The repose at Gnadenhuetten was of short duration. A cruel Indian war, occasioned by the contest between the English and French, broke out, spreading terror and confusion through the whole country. The first outrage was committed near Shomokin, where three of the missionaries resided, but through the mercy of God they were all preserved, though exposed to continual danger. The inhabitants of Gnadenhuetten were not so fortunate. Being considered as friends to the British government, they were in the most imminent danger of being attacked by the Indians, in league with the French, and as the most dreadful reports reached them from all quarters, some were so much intimidated, that they fled into the woods. The greater part, however, staid in the settlement, resigned to the will of God, giving the most encouraging assurances, that they would not forsake each other, but remain united in life and death.

But God had otherwise ordained. Late in the evening of the 24th of November, 1755, while the missionaries were at supper, their attention was suddenly roused by the continual barking of dogs, which was followed by the report of a gun. On opening the door of the mission-house, they observed a party of hostile Indians standing before the house with their pieces pointed towards the door. On its being opened they immediately fired, and Martin Nitschman was killed on the spot. His wife and some others were wounded, but ran up stairs into the garret and barricaded the door with bedsteads. Hither the savages pursued them; but, not being able to force open the door, they set fire to the house, which was soon enveloped in flames. Two of the brethren had previously made their escape by jumping out of a back window; and now a boy leaped down from the flaming roof, though not till one of his cheeks had been grazed by a ball and his hand much burned. Sister Partsch, whose husband had escaped out of the window, likewise ventured to leap down from the burning roof. Unobserved by the enemies she hid herself behind a tree on rising ground, from whence she had a full view of the tragical scene. Brother Fabricius, in attempting to make his escape in the same manner, was perceived by the Indians, and instantly wounded by two balls. They then seized him, and having dispatched him with their hatchets, took his scalp and left him dead on the ground. Eleven persons, belonging to the mission, were burned alive, among whom was a child only fifteen months old. Sister Senseman, already surrounded by the flames, was heard to exclaim: "'Tis all well, dear Saviour! I expected nothing else." The murderers now set fire to the barns and stables, by which all the corn, hay and cattle were consumed; and, having made a hearty meal, they departed.

This melancholy occurrence proved the deliverance of the Christian Indians; for, upon hearing the report of guns, seeing the flames, and learning the dreadful cause from those who escaped, they offered to attack the enemy without delay; but, being advised to the contrary, they all fled into the woods, and the settlement was thus in a few minutes cleared of its inhabitants. By the exertions and persuasions of the missionary, Shebosh, who alone remained at Gnadenhuetten, most of the fugitive converts returned the next day. They now hoped to remain in safety, as, in consequence of a petition, presented by the Brethren at Bethlehem, the governor of Pennsylvania sent a party of soldiers into these parts, for the protection of the Christian Indians and the country in general. But on New Year's day 1756 the savages attacked these troops, set fire to the settlement, and laid waste all the plantations; by which both the congregation and the missionaries were reduced to the greatest poverty.

* The inhabitants of Gnadenhuetten belonged to these nations.

Disastrous as were these events, they served to avert a far greater calamity. The adversaries of the Brethren had secretly formed a design of overthrowing their whole establishment in North America. The most unfounded reports of their being in league with the French were industriously disseminated, and a base fabrication, purporting to be a letter written by a French officer, was inserted in the newspaper, in which he was represented as saying, that "the Moravians were their good friends, and would give them every assistance in their power against the English." A general suspicion was thus excited against the Brethren throughout the country, which went so far, that in the Jerseys proclamation was made, with beat of drum, that Bethlehem should be destroyed; and the most dreadful threats were added, that in Bethlehem, Gnadenhuetten and other places, a carnage should be made, such as had never before been heard of in North America. It was afterwards ascertained that a party of a hundred men, who came to Bethlehem, was sent for the express purpose of raising a mob; but the kind and hospitable manner in which they were treated by the inhabitants, who were ignorant of their design, overcame their malice and softened their rage. It was not, however, till after the burning of Gnadenhuetten that the public sentiment respecting the Brethren underwent a complete revolution. Their adversaries were now convinced of the falsehood of the charges brought against them, as they were the first sufferers from the French. Many exclaimed even with tears: "How greatly have we sinned against an innocent people! What should we have had to answer for, had we followed our design of exterminating the Brethren and murdering their men, women and children, on the vague supposition that they were our enemies."

After the destruction of Gnadenhuetten, a few of the Indian converts fled to Wayomik, which place they reached in safety; but the greater part flocked to Bethlehem, where they were lodged, clothed, and fed with brotherly kindness. But this very circumstance rendered the situation of our Brethren there peculiarly critical. The savages, on the one hand, insisted upon their taking up arms against the English, threatening to murder them in case of refusal. On the other hand, a set of fanatics arose, who demanded the total extirpation of all the Indians, lest God's vengeance should fall upon the Christians for not destroying the Indians, as the Israelites were commanded to do in the case of the Canaanites. These people were greatly incensed against Bethlehem, on account of the protection and assistance which were there granted to a race of beings, whom they considered accursed. The inhabitants of Bethlehem, therefore, looked upon themselves as sheep ready for slaughter; and never knew, when going to bed at night, whether they would rise the next morning.

In this critical and alarming situation they preserved unshaken confidence in God. Their courage in maintaining their station proved a comfort and protection to their neighbours; for, if they had fled, nothing could have obstructed the inroads of the savages. But, while they firmly relied on the help of the Lord, they neglected nothing that might tend to their safety. The settlement was surrounded by pallisades, and guarded, both night and day, by Europeans and Indians. This precaution proved the means of saving the settlement, while many adjacent villages were laid in ashes.

The firmness of the Brethren and their good political regulations, induced great numbers of their distressed neighbours to take refuge with them. Several hundred women and children came from a distance, and with tears begged for shelter. All were admitted as long as there was any room; and thus not only Bethlehem, but the four contiguous settlements of Nazareth, Christiansbrun, Friedensthal, and the Rose, were crowded with fugitives. Though, in consequence of the war, their own resources were greatly exhausted, the Brethren exerted themselves to the utmost of their power to provide for their numerous guests. Thus wonderfully did the wisdom of God overrule passing events. The very people, who were but lately suspected of a correspondence with the enemy, now became the protectors and defenders of those who through ignorance had aspersed their character and meditated their destruction.

Under the wings of Bethlehem the Indian congregation now enjoyed a season of repose. Some additional temporary dwellings were erected for them; the schools commenced anew and were diligently attended, and three missionaries were appointed for their immediate service. Portions of the Scripture, the litany and several hymns were translated, and the children often met together, and in the German, Mahikan, and Delaware languages sang the praises of God their Saviour. Thus Bethlehem assumed the appearance of a missionary settlement. Amidst much external poverty and distress the grace of God ruled in the hearts of its inhabitants; and both the Indian converts and the original European colonists showed forth the praises of Him, who had called them out of darkness into his marvellous light.*

The residence of the Indians at Bethlehem, however, was attended with various difficulties; both the missionaries and the Indians themselves, therefore, wished to have a settlement of their own. Application being made to the governor, he readily acceded to this measure; and in June 1757 a piece of land was assigned them, about a mile from Bethlehem, on which they erected a town, and called it Nain. Most of the Christian Indians, who, during the late troubles, had moved to Wayomik, or fled to the Susquehannah, now sought permission to live at Nain; and thus this new settlement rapidly increased. Numbers of savages visited both in Nain and Bethlehem, and the testimony of Christ and his atonement, seconded by the pious conversation of their Christian countrymen, proved in many instances the means of conversion.

This period of difficulty and trouble was succeeded by four or five years of peace and tranquillity. After the burning of Fort Duquesne by the French, the scene of the contest was changed; and from the beginning of the year 1759, neither Pennsylvania, nor the neighbouring provinces, were disturbed by the Indians. Thus all the settlements of the Brethren in this district enjoyed rest and prosperity; and so rapidly advanced in the esteem of their neighbours, that those who had formerly been their bitterest enemies, and even sought their entire expulsion, were now, in general, pleased with their farming establishments in their vicinity.

The Indian congregation at Nain increased so fast, that it was found expedient to purchase fourteen hundred acres of land behind the Blue Mountains, in order to form an additional settlement. The building of this place, called Wechquetank, was begun the following spring.

About this time, David Zeisberger, accompanied by an Indian brother, undertook a journey to Machwihilusing on the Susquehannah, a report having reached the Brethren, that the Indians in that place had been in a remarkable manner stirred up to inquire the way of truth, and were very desirous of obtaining a teacher to instruct them. When the travellers approached the town, they found this report confirmed. For being met by one of the inhabitants, he informed them that their council had assembled six days successively, to consider how they might procure a teacher of the truth. Under these favourable circumstances, Zeisberger and his companion entered the town, and were received with general demonstrations of joy, being lodged by Papunhank.† In the evening all the inhabitants met; and the missionary and his companion, though greatly fatigued with their journey, testified to them of the grace of God till midnight, and resumed their labours by five o'clock the next morning, the people being eager to hear the great word, before they began their daily occupations. The result was, that upon a regular application from the heads of families to our Brethren at Bethlehem, brother Zeisberger was appointed to reside among them.

But, while rejoicing at the favourable reception given to his testimony of the gospel, events occurred which rendered his recall to Bethlehem necessary. Intelligence had been received, that the Indians had commenced fresh hostilities near the Canadian lakes and on the Ohio, where they had murdered several hundred settlers, and renewed their incursions into Pennsylvania. From this, a repetition of the dreadful scenes in 1755 was apprehended.

* See History of the Brethren's Church, Vol. I. p. 381, &c.

† This Indian had for some time set up for a preacher of morality among his people; but as his instructions had no influence either on himself or his hearers, in changing their profligate conduct, the latter began to doubt whether his doctrines were true. Having afterwards himself visited Nain, heard the gospel, and been present at a baptism, he was so overcome that he burst into tears, and exclaimed: "O God! have mercy upon me, and grant that the death of my Saviour may be made manifest unto me." On his return he thus addressed his countrymen: "My dear people, I have told you many good things, and pointed out what I considered a good way; but I have now learnt that it was not the right way. If we wish to be saved, we must look to that Saviour whom the Brethren preach." He was the first in Machwihilusing that was admitted to holy baptism, and by his conduct and conversation evidenced that a real change had taken place in him.

The settlements of Wechquetank and Nain were now placed in the most critical situation. One alarming report after another reached them, which made it needful to keep up a constant watch during the night. The Christian Indians, however, resolved to take no part in the contest, any further than defending themselves against the savages. Under these circumstances, the Indian brethren showed great faith and courage. One of them remarked: "Wicked people are as weak as worms in the sight of our Saviour: he can and will protect us, and cause fear to fall upon the wicked." His words were verified on the very next day, being the 9th of October, 1763; for on that day about fifty white men assembled on the opposite side of the Lecha, with a view to surprise Nain in the night, and murder all the inhabitants. But a neighbouring friend representing in strong terms the danger and difficulty of such an attempt, the enemies abandoned their design and returned home.

The same day on which Nain was in such imminent danger, a party of Irish freebooters came to Wechquetank, intending to murder all the Indians there, whom they accused of being accomplices in a late murder committed in their colony. No remonstrances of the missionary could restrain their fury, till he at length pacified them by presents and by plentifully supplying them with meat and drink. Upon this, they quietly quitted the settlement; not, however, without repeating their threats to return and execute their barbarous design, unless the Indians would soon remove from that place. During the succeeding night, all the men were upon the watch, as several spies were lurking about the settlement, and a fire at some distance betrayed a neighbouring encampment. The Brethren, therefore, apprehended a sudden attack, which was probably prevented by violent rain that fell during the night.

It now became sufficiently evident that it would be extreme temerity to postpone their flight any longer; especially as a messenger just then arrived from Bethlehem with the most pressing solicitations to the Indians to break up immediately, and retire to the settlement at Nazareth.* While preparing for their departure, they were suddenly alarmed by the report of several muskets. The Christian Indians, supposing that the savages had attacked the white people, resolved to go and defend them. But the missionary dissuaded them from this, exhorting them to stand by each other and expect deliverance from God. "Very true," replied one of them, "only don't you stand before me, but go behind, for I will be shot first." The party from whom the attack was apprehended, suddenly marched off with the Indian war-whoop; and it was afterwards discovered, that the firing proceeded from a party of soldiers. Thankful for having escaped this danger, the whole congregation left Wechquetank on the 11th of October, and arrived the next day in safety at Nain, where they were welcomed with joy, and provided with every comfort and accommodation which their circumstances required.

In the mean time, Nain was closely blockaded. The savages continued to lay waste the country and murder the neighbouring settlers. This increased the fury of the latter against the Indians, so that the inhabitants of Nain could no longer venture to go to Bethlehem, but were obliged to employ a European brother to transact their business. No Indian even ventured to fetch wood, or look after his cattle, except he was accompanied by a white brother, or had a passport in his pocket. Even at home the men were forced to keep strict watch, both day and night. In this trying situation they remained for four weeks; but the peace of God and brotherly love ruled among them, and supported their courage and patience.

Having made such regulations for defence that the enemy could not attempt an attack without danger, they flattered themselves that government would have assisted them. But very unexpectedly affairs took a different turn. Renatus, a harmless Indian, was suddenly apprehended as the murderer of one of the Irish settlers; and his person being sworn to by the widow of the deceased, he was conveyed to Philadelphia and imprisoned. The news of this occurrence rapidly spread through the country, and enflamed the rage of the settlers against the Indians. The inhabitants, therefore, expected nothing but the most cruel treatment.

In this dreadful emergency, God appeared for their help; and by inclining the chief magistrate to afford them protection, rescued them from the hand of their enemies. November 6th an express arrived from Philadelphia, with an order from government, that all the Christian Indians from Nain and Wechquetank should repair to that city, where they would be protected on delivering up their arms. This measure was indeed very painful to the Indians, who declared they would rather die than leave their teachers. But, being assured that the missionaries would not forsake them, they cheerfully acquiesced. And when the sheriff arrived, they delivered their arms to him with a composure of mind which strikingly evidenced the change wrought in them through the gospel, for a heathen Indian would rather part with his head than with his gun.

The Indians of Nain having joined their Christian countrymen of Wechquetank, who had previously removed to Nazareth, the whole company set out on their pilgrimage in the afternoon of the 8th of November, accompanied by the missionaries Grube, Schmick, David Zeisberger and John Rothe, with the wives of the two former, under the conduct of the sheriff, who cared for them like a father. It was a most affecting sight to behold these people, among whom were many aged, infirm and sick, besides pregnant women and young children, proceeding patiently along the road, ignorant of their future fate. Though wagons were provided for the sick, the aged and the children, yet they suffered much from fatigue and other hardships, and still more from the malice of some settlers, who abused and loaded them with curses.

Having on the 11th of November arrived at Philadelphia, they were ordered to be lodged in the barracks; but, notwithstanding the positive order of government, the soldiers forcibly refused them admittance. The poor Indians were kept standing in the street for five hours. A mob soon collected, who derided, reviled and charged them with all the outrages committed by the savages, threatening to kill them on the spot; which they would no doubt have done, had the Indians returned evil for evil. The zealous interference of the missionaries in behalf of their beloved converts, exposed them to the most imminent danger from the fury of the populace.

The magistrates at length interposed, ordering them to proceed six miles further, to Province Island, in the river Delaware, where they lodged in some large buildings. In passing through the city, thousands followed them with such tumultuous clamour, that they appeared like sheep among wolves. Here they settled as well as circumstances would permit, and regulated their daily meetings for worship, which proved a great comfort to them. Several gentlemen in Philadelphia, especially some Quakers, humanely interested themselves in their behalf, and they were kindly supplied by government with whatever they needed.

They had not been here long when intelligence was received that Wechquetank had been burnt by some of the settlers, and that some incendiaries had endeavoured to set fire to Bethlehem, and actually laid the oil-mill in ashes, the adjoining water-work having been with great difficulty saved from destruction. The Brethren, therefore, were truly thankful that the Christian Indians had found a safe retreat in Province Island; and their gratitude was increased when they were informed of an act of horrid cruelty committed by some white people, calling themselves Christians. Fifty-seven of these barbarians attacked a party of peaceable Indians in the village of Canestoga, near Lancaster, and murdered fourteen of them in their huts. The rest fled to Lancaster, where the magistrates lodged and protected them in the work-house, a strong and well secured building. But the white savages pursued them, marched into the town at noonday, broke into the work-house; and, though the Indians on their knees begged their lives, they inhumanly murdered them all, and threw their mangled bodies into the streets. They then departed with a dreadful shout of victory, threatening that the Indians in Province Island should share the same fate.

So general and inveterate was the rage of the white people, and such the state of anarchy and insubordination in the country, that in defiance of every proclamation from government, they boldly avowed their determination to massacre all the Christian Indians. This induced the government to send them by way of New York to the English army. Late in the evening of January 4th, 1761, they received orders to this effect, and before midnight embarked in some boats, proceeding by water to a place about five miles from Philadelphia, which city they reached almost unobserved early in the morning. The commissary, Mr. Fox, having kindly supplied them with blankets, and provided wagons for the aged, the sick and the children, and for the heavy baggage, they set out, accompanied by the missionaries. The pressure of the immense crowd which had collected was so great, that they could hardly proceed; the mob in the most shocking manner cursed and reviled them; but, being escorted by a company of seventy Highlanders, no one ventured to lay hands on them. In every town through which they passed, they were insulted by the populace; but God mercifully prevented serious mischief, and in about a week they safely reached Amboy, where two sloops lay ready to carry them to New York. They were just preparing to embark, when very unexpectedly strict orders arrived from the governor of New York, that no Indian should set foot on that territory; and even the ferrymen were prohibited, under a severe penalty, from conveying them across the river.

* Nazareth, like Bethlehem, was a colony of European brothers and sisters.

They were now lodged in the barracks at Amboy, waiting for further orders. Here they held their daily meetings; and, as great numbers of strangers attended, divine service was performed in the open air. Their devotion and good behaviour excited general admiration, and many conceived a more favourable opinion of them. A soldier once said: "Would to God that all the white people were as good Christians as these Indians."

Orders having meanwhile arrived from Philadelphia for their return to that city, the Indians cheerfully obeyed, confident that the Lord, in his inscrutable wisdom, had directed their toilsome peregrinations for some gracious purposes. This journey was often rendered peculiarly dangerous in crossing the frozen rivers, the ice not being every where sufficiently firm. Their daily meetings, which they never suspended during their travels, were attended by many white people with astonishment and edification.

Having safely reached Philadelphia on the 24th of January, 1764, they were for security lodged in the barracks, and attended by a military guard day and night. As the fury and number of the mob still increased, the magistrates were obliged to adopt more serious measures. The guard was doubled, eight pieces of cannon were planted before the barracks, and a rampart thrown up in the middle of the square. The citizens, some of whom were young Quakers, took up arms and repaired to the barracks in defence of the Indians. Twice the rebels prepared for an attack; but being fully informed of the measures of defence taken by government, abandoned their murderous design. Upon this, some gentlemen were deputed to inquire into their complaints. After much insolent behaviour, they asserted that there were several murderers among the Christian Indians whom they had seen at Pittsburgh, and demanded that they should be delivered up. To pacify them, one of the ringleaders was admitted into the barracks; but after very strict examination of all the Indians, he did not find an individual chargeable with the smallest crime. Another allegation, that the Quakers had secreted six of them, proving equally unfounded, tranquillity was finally restored.

During their residence in the barracks, which lasted rather more than a year, they regularly held their meetings for religious worship, which on Sundays were frequented by such crowds of people, that the chapel could not contain them: yet the greatest silence and order were preserved, and in several instances the gospel was accompanied with saving power. At stated times they observed the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, and some were admitted to holy baptism. The missionary Grube even commenced an English school, and the Indian youths took great delight in learning. Though the visits of strangers were occasionally attended with inconvenience, yet they tended to convince many ill-disposed persons of the innocence of the Indians and their true conversion to God.

To the Indians, however, their present situation was a severe trial, and to some even more afflicting than all their past dangers. The superior quality of their victuals, to which they had not been accustomed, was no more conducive to their health than the want of exercise and proper employment was congenial to their minds and habits. Their close confinement became insupportable and revolting to their notions of independence and liberty. This was especially the case with the young people; some grew low-spirited, others dissatisfied, and even refractory; and many suffered harm by their intercourse with the unconverted Indians, quartered in the same barracks. This caused the missionaries much grief and perplexity, being on the one hand obliged to hear all the complaints of the dissatisfied, and on the other hand aware that government justly looked to them for the maintenance of good order and subordination. As summer advanced, fevers and the small-pox broke out amongst them, which occasioned such terror, that many meditated their escape from the barracks. But God so evidently blessed the endeavours of the missionaries, that their uneasiness was changed into perfect resignation to the will of the Lord. No less than fifty-six persons departed this life; many of them not only with composure, but in full assurance of eternal glory.

Among the Christian Indians lodged in the barracks, none had a harder fate than one called Renatus. This poor man had been thrown into prison upon repeated accusations on oath, that he was the murderer of Mr. S. in the Irish settlement. During his confinement, which lasted eight months, three of his nearest relatives died by means of the infectious disease, rife in the barracks. When informed of this, he burst into tears and exclaimed: "This is almost too much to bear; to lose my father, my wife, and my child, while I myself am confined in prison." The missionaries frequently visited him in his cell, where he spent his time in reading and prayer. His trial took place at Easton; and, after a most patient investigation of the evidence adduced on both sides, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty; upon which he was immediately set at liberty. This decision was of great benefit to the missionary labours of the Brethren, as it entirely frustrated the aim of their enemies, to cast an odium upon the believing Indians and render the mission generally suspected.

Hostilities having at length terminated, and peace being restored, the directors of the mission lost no time in endeavouring to obtain an eligible place for a settlement for the Christian Indians, and for this purpose preferred the country on the banks of the Susquehannah. The government readily acceded to their proposal, permitting them to leave the barracks, and liberally supplied them with all necessaries. Mr. Fox even procured a grant, by which they were provided with flour from the time of their arrival on the Susquehannah till their new planted Indian corn should be ripe. Before their departure, the Indian brethren delivered an address of thanks to the governor for the kindness he had manifested towards them, which was signed by four in the name of the rest, and graciously received.

March 20th, 1765, they left the barracks in Philadelphia, and commenced their journey, resting a few days at Nain and Bethlehem. The animosity of the white people not having yet wholly subsided, they were obliged to take a very circuitous route, which rendered the journey tedious and difficult. The road lay through extensive forests, frequently without a path, so that they had to cut their way for miles through the woods, and to ford many rivers. The men generally waded through, and constructed rafts for the women and children. Some rivers were so broad and deep, that they were obliged to encamp on the banks till they had built a sufficient number of canoes to cross them. In some places they were obliged to unload the wagons, and carry the luggage over high, steep and craggy hills. When they halted in the evening, every family erected a hut for the night, keeping up a large fire. All the fatigue and toils of the day were forgotten, when at night they assembled in the open air, round a large fire, to return thanks to the Lord for his mercies during the day, and supplicate his protection for the night. Their greatest difficulty arose from the want of provisions whenever they passed through a territory which afforded neither game nor fish. Those who had any thing in store were always ready to divide with the rest. Their whole stock of flour being at length consumed, it was a truly affecting sight to see them receive their last portion. They occasionally found wild potatoes, and hunger overcame the unpleasant taste of these roots. At other times they peeled chesnut trees, and sucked the juice oozing out under the bark, which is very sweet, and was particularly palatable to the children. Frequently they had no other drink than muddy water found in puddles. One night they were greatly terrified, the woods being on fire, and burning with great fury round their encampment till one o'clock in the morning. Some died by the way, in consequence of these various hardships. Having, after many toilsome wanderings, reached the Susquehannah, they got a few boats, some sailing up the river and others travelling along its banks, and arrived at Machwihilusing on the 9th of May, after a journey of five weeks.

Having fixed on a convenient spot for a settlement, they immediately began to erect a town, which, when completed, consisted of thirteen Indian huts, and upwards of forty houses built of wood in the European manner, besides a dwelling for the missionaries. In the middle of the street, which was eighty feet broad, stood a large and neat chapel. The adjoining ground was laid out in gardens; and between the town and the river, about two hundred and fifty acres were divided into regular plantations of Indian corn. The burying ground was situated at some distance at the back of the buildings. Each family had its own boat. To this place they gave the name of Friedenshuetten.

This new settlement soon assumed a very flourishing appearance. The inhabitants were industrious, and dwelt together in peace and unity. Many Indians visited the place, admiring the fine situation and the good order maintained in the town. But what afforded the missionaries the greatest delight, was the salutary impression which appeared to be made on some, so that the number of the congregation was rapidly increasing, which in less than two years rendered the erection of a larger chapel necessary. Indeed the change observable in the believing Indians was so striking, that the heathen visitors were not unfrequently constrained to confess, "That the words of the Brethren must be true, for otherwise it would be impossible that the mere belief of them should make their converts willing to deny the world and every ungodly lust, and at the same time to be so serene and cheerful in their looks and behaviour.

This pleasing and tranquil course was occasionally interrupted by the unbecoming behaviour of some of the heathen visiters, and still more by the white traders, who dealt chiefly in rum, and often came to the settlement for the purpose of traffic, occasioning much levity and dissipation among the young people. The missionaries, not wishing to have the appearance of usurping any jurisdiction over the Indians, left it to the native assistants and heads of families, to whom the police of the town was committed, to adopt such measures, as might prevent this evil in future. And their exertions in this respect in a great measure succeeded.

In autumn, 1767, the missionary Zeisberger and two of the Indian assistants made a journey to the Ohio, intelligence having been received that some Indians in that part of the country were desirous of hearing the gospel. Their intention was first to visit Goshgoshuenk, though they every where received the most unfavourable accounts of its inhabitants. On this journey they had to encounter many difficulties, having to travel through an extensive wilderness.

Their road lay partly through the territory of the Delaware, and partly through that of the Seneka Indians. On reaching the first town, inhabited by the latter, the appearance of a white man was so unusual a sight, that one of the inhabitants immediately rode off to announce his arrival to the chief of the next town, a distance of nearly thirty miles. Having arrived at this place, the chief, taking Zeisberger for a spy, at first treated him rather roughly; but, won by his conciliatory and affable manner, and the disinterestedness of his views, he became very friendly, and conducted him to his house. Zeisberger seized this favourable opportunity to preach the gospel to him; but the chief declared, with great warmth, that this Word of God was not intended for the Indians. He, however, granted them permission to proceed to Goshgoshuenk, adding a serious caution against trusting the people of that place, who had not their equals in wickedness and cruelty.

Not intimidated by this and similar reports, but rather considering the profligacy of the place the most cogent reason for visiting it, they prosecuted their route and reached it in safety. They soon found that the reports they had heard were but too true. Zeisberger remarks, he had no where seen the abominations of heathenism practised in such a horrid and shameless manner as in this place; it seemed to be the very seat of Satan. Notwithstanding the crying wickedness of the inhabitants, the missionary and his companions were well received; and their doctrine, by its novelty, so engaged the attention of the inhabitants, that they could not hear enough of it, and requested the Indian brethren to repeat and explain it to them more fully. Before their departure, the Indians assembled a council, and Reisberger asked them whether they would permit a teacher to reside among them? To this they gave their unanimous consent, and even requested him to promote the attainment of so desirable an object.

His journey proving thus far encouraging, the Brethren resolved to attempt the establishment of a regular mission at Goshgoshuenk. In order to effect this, the brethren Zeisberger and Senseman, together with some Indian families, moved thither in the following spring. Immediately on their arrival Zeisberger sent information of it to the chiefs, who exhorted their people to listen to the word of God with attention. He held regular morning and evening devotions, and preached every day. These meetings were attended by great numbers, whose behaviour was silent and decorous, and manifested an eagerness to hear.

Soon, however, a violent opposition, originating in the jealousy of the chiefs, was raised against the missionaries. It was augmented by the most ridiculous and unfounded accusations being propagated against the Brethren; and it at last rose to such a pitch, that they threatened to kill both them and their converts. This intimidated even those who had hitherto been their friends.

Notwithstanding these alarming appearances, the missionaries resolved not to quit their post; but built a small house, as a place of retirement, where they might celebrate the Lord's Supper and hold other meetings with the Christian Indians, their present habitation being seldom free from visiters. Their labour was not wholly in vain. Not a few attended their meetings, and some heard the gospel with saving effect. Several, indeed, came only by night, fearing the reproach of men; for those, who went boldly to the meetings, were abused and persecuted in various ways; and in some instances the words of our Saviour were literally fulfilled: a man's foes shall be they of his own household. Matt. x. 36. At length the inhabitants of the town were divided into two parties; one of which opposed the gospel with all their might, and the other became so much attached to it, that they declared they would rather emigrate than be deprived of it. These were exposed to the hatred of the opposite party, who branded them with the names of Sunday Indians and Shwonnaks, i. e. white people, the latter being the most opprobrious epithet they could apply. This, however, did not deter them from their attendance on the meeting.

However, as the opposition did not abate, but rather increased, the missionaries thought it prudent to retire to a place on the opposite bank of the river, called Lawunakhannek, about fifteen miles distant from Goshgoshuenk. Here they formed a temporary settlement, being followed by all those Indians who had sincerely embraced the gospel. In process of time they had the pleasure of admitting several to holy baptism, among whom was an aged chief, who had lost his sight. By degrees the hostility against them subsided, and in a council held at Goshgoshuenk a great majority declared in favour of the gospel. This rendered their situation more tranquil and easy, a different spirit prevailed, and the desire of the Indians to "know the grace of God in truth" increased.

Among the places, which were visited by the missionaries from Friedenshuetten, was a town about thirty miles higher upon the banks of the Susquehannah, called Tshechshequannink, in which a great awakening took place, occasioned by the accounts concerning Friedenshuetten brought by those who had visited there. At the request of the inhabitants, the missionary Rothe went to reside among them. His testimony of Jesus was accompanied with great power, the audience being frequently melted into tears, which is very unusual among the Indians, as they consider it unmanly to shed tears. One of them remarked: "I would not have wept, if my enemies had cut the flesh from my bones: that I now weep is of God, who has softened the hardness of my heart." For some time it appeared as if the whole town would turn to the Lord and be converted.

The tranquillity, enjoyed for a season, was again interrupted in 1770. The Seneka Indians having broken the treaty lately made with the Cherokees, hostilities commenced in the neighbourhood of Lawunakhannek. This rendered the Christian Indians desirous of removing, and they therefore resolved to accept the kind offer, repeatedly made to them by some chiefs, to settle near the Delaware town of Kaskaskunk.

In April the missionaries and their whole flock embarked in sixteen canoes, passing down the river Ohio by Pittsburgh to the mouth of the Beaver creek, which they entered, proceeding up the falls, where they had several times to unload, and transport their goods and canoes by land. On one of these carrying-places they were detained two days. After a tedious and troublesome journey of a fortnight, they reached the place allotted to them by the chiefs. No spot could have been better chosen, as there was good land, sufficient to support a hundred families. They immediately began to build and plant, and called the place Friedenstadt.

The Indians in the neighbourhood were astonished to see a people settle among them, differing so much in their manners and customs from the other natives, and to hear them propagate the doctrine so contrary to any thing they had ever heard before. In some this astonishment soon changed into animosity and opposition, especially when the chief of Kaskaskunk moved to the settlement. This so enraged the adversaries, that they annoyed the inhabitants in every possible way, disseminating unfounded calumnies. They even forged messages in the names of the chiefs, ordering them to quit the country. These impostures being detected, some of their own teachers violently opposed the doctrine taught by the missionaries, asserting, that emetics were the only infallible remedy to cleanse a man from sin. The missionary endeavoured to convince them, that though an emetic might benefit their stomachs, it could never cleanse their hearts. Some malicious savages came late one evening to Friedenstadt, tempting the inhabitants to get drunk. Finding all their efforts ineffectual, they threatened to murder first the missionaries and then the whole congregation, and made such a hideous noise, that the women fled into the woods, and the men were forced to keep strict watch round the mission-house.

While harassed by these external troubles, the missionaries had abundant cause to praise God for the divine power which rested on their ministry in the gospel. The number of hearers at Friedenstadt rapidly increased. Among these was a man belonging to the party, who had destroyed the mission-house on the Mahony in 1755, and who was often so much impressed by what he heard, that he shed floods of tears. In another of their hearers the effect produced by the gospel was still more striking. This was the chief, Pakanke, hitherto an enemy and opposer, but whose sentiments, during a visit at Friedenstadt, were so completely changed, that he listened to the gospel with great attention; which produced such a change in him, that he became a believer himself, and even exhorted his children to go to the Brethren, and believe in the Lord Jesus. Among the baptized members of the congregation the peace of God, brotherly love and a real desire to love the Saviour and cleave to him with purpose of heart, prevailed. Their conduct and conversation became increasingly conformable to their Christian profession, and they greatly valued their high and heavenly calling. In the children, likewise, the missionaries observed many astonishing evidences of the work of the holy Spirit, in "perfecting praise out of the mouth of babes and sucklings." And the awakening among the catechumens was general and solid, and exhibited a sincere desire to obtain grace and the remission of sins in the blood of Christ.

In the mean time they received certain information, that the Iroquois had clandestinely sold the land, on which Friedenshuetten stood, to the English, though they had formally ceded it to the Christian Indians in 1765. This involved that settlement in new troubles. They therefore resolved to quit that place, and to seek another residence.

Early in June, 1772, the whole congregation, consisting of two hundred and forty-one persons, left Friedenshuetten, some of them travelling by land, but the greater part by water. The difficulties attending the emigration of so many people, with all their goods and cattle, in a country like America, is almost incredible. The party, who went by land, had to care for seventy oxen and a still greater number of horses, and sustained inconceivable hardships in forcing their way through very thick woods and swamps, directed only by a small path, in some places hardly discernible. They had to ford many rivers, being in one part of the country obliged to wade thirty-six times through the windings of the Munsy. The difficulties of those who went by water were not less. They were every night obliged to seek a lodging on shore. In some places they were molested by inquisitive, and in others, by drunken people. The many falls and dangerous rapids in the Susquehannah, occasioned much trouble and frequent delays. To add to their difficulties, the measles broke out among them soon after their departure, of which many, especially children, fell sick, and some died. Both companies having at length met, they pursued their journey by land. Arrived on the banks of the Ohio, they built canoes for conveying the aged and infirm, with the baggage, down the river; and in a few days the whole party reached Friedenstadt, and were most cordially welcomed by the Christian Indians there, who united with them in solemn praises to God for their safe arrival, after a tedious journey of eight weeks.

It was not, however, the design of the Indians to fix themselves permanently at this place; but to proceed to the banks of the Muskingum, and occupy a piece of ground, which had been allotted them by the council of the Delawares. The council had passed a formal resolution, that this tract of land, which was of considerable extent, should exclusively belong to the Christian Indians, and no others be permitted to settle upon it; and that all Indians, dwelling on its borders, should be ordered to behave peaceably towards the missionaries and their converts, and neither disturb their worship, nor prevent any from attending the preaching of the gospel. Zeisberger had visited this place early in the spring, and found it in all respects an eligible situation for an Indian town, having an excellent spring, a small lake, a fine soil, plenty of game, and every other convenience. It lies about seventy-five miles west of Friedenstadt, and nearly at the same distance south of Lake Erie.

Five families of Christian Indians had in May removed to this place and begun the erection of a settlement, giving it the name of Schoenbrunn. They were now joined by those who had emigrated from Friedenshuetten.

About this period the prospect at Friedenstadt became more and more alarming. The repeated encroachments of the savages occasioned much perplexity, and the pernicious consequences of the rum-trade became at length insupportable. The savages frequently brought a quantity of spirits close to the town, got intoxicated, and behaved like madmen, committing various acts of mischief and outrage, even threatening to kill the missionary. It was solely owing to the restraining hand of Providence that they did not execute their barbarous purpose. At one time a ruffian furiously rushed into the house where the missionary lay sick, but, on seeing the fellow come in, he raised himself and looked at him with undaunted composure. This completely disconcerted the savage, he stopped short, and the Indian brethren, hastening to the assistance of the teacher, easily secured him. These unpleasant occurrences seeming to admit of no alleviation, the inhabitants resolved, though much against their inclination, to forsake the place, and remove into the neighbourhood of their Brethren on the Muskingum, where they arrived after a journey of three weeks. Here they established a colony, about ten miles below Schoenbrun, which they called Gnadenhuetten.

During the building of these two settlements, Zeisberger, accompanied by two Indian brethren, made a journey into the country of the Shawanose, who were generally considered the most savage of all the Indian tribes. They were, however, kindly received by the chief, and lodged in the house of one of the heathen teachers. This man, being informed by the missionary that the object of their journey was to preach the words of eternal life, replied: "This is what we want, and we will hear you with pleasure." Having for several days attentively listened to the discourses and conversation of the missionary and his companions, the heathen teacher made the following remarkable declaration: "I have not been able to sleep all night, for I am continually meditating upon your words, and will now open to you my whole heart: I believe that all you preach is truth. A year ago I became convinced that we are altogether sinful creatures; and that none of our good works will save us: but we did not know what to do to gain eternal salvation. I have, therefore, always comforted my people, that some person would come and show to us the true way to happiness, for we are not in the right way; and even the day before your arrival, I desired them to have but a little patience, and a teacher would certainly come. Now you are come, and I verily believe that God has sent you to make his word known to us." The council having formally declared their wish that the Brethren would come and reside among them, the travellers, filled with gratitude to God for this hopeful prospect, returned to Schoenbrunn. The more poignant was their sorrow, when, on repeating their visit the next year, they met with so much opposition and hostility, as fully convinced them, that as yet no missionary establishment could be formed here.

About this time new troubles interrupted the tranquillity of the congregations at Schoenbrunn and Gnadenhuetten. Besides the continuance of petty wars among the Indian tribes, the white settlers in Virginia were obliged to fly to arms to defend themselves against the savages. This rendered the year 1774 a period of great perplexity and confusion to the two settlements. For many months the inhabitants had hardly a single day of rest. Numerous troops of warriors passed through, some upon murdering expeditions, others with scalps and prisoners, uttering frequent menaces, that both places should be surprised and laid waste. Owing to their enmity against the white people, the missionaries in particular were in the most imminent danger. One terrifying report after another was flying through the country. They were frequently so much alarmed that canoes were kept in constant readiness in case sudden flight should become necessary. The women were more than once driven from the plantations at noon-day; and all the inhabitants were, for days and weeks, confined to their houses, as several parties were strolling about the neighbourhood for the purpose of seizing stragglers. At length the Indians were compelled to submit to make peace, and thus tranquillity was restored.

The missionaries found great reason to rejoice that amidst all these troubles the two congregations continued to flourish. They had not once been obliged to omit the stated preaching of the gospel, and the number of their hearers was often so large that the chapel at Schoenbrunn, though capable of accommodating five hundred, proved too small. Among the strangers who attended there were many warriors, and the impression made on some was such, that, though they returned home for a time, they could not rest till they obtained leave to reside with the Christian Indians. Even one of the heathen teachers was so struck with conviction of the truth of the gospel, that he took up his abode in the settlement. One of the chiefs likewise embraced Christianity, was baptized, and became a zealous witness of the doctrines of grace among the very people whose chief he had been. And the Indian, appointed his successor, declined the honour intended for him, choosing rather to be an humble follower of Christ than to occupy the highest and most honourable rank among his countrymen.

During the war there was a striking contrast between the conduct of the Christian Indians and the savages. While the latter neglected every thing, the former, though exposed to many interruptions, continued to plant their fields, boil sugar, and follow their various avocations with their usual diligence. God blessed the labour of their hands, so that they could assist those that were needy, and even provide many of the warriors who marched through their village, with food and other necessaries. This led a captain to remark: "I have found your people very different from what I had heard. It was reported in our town that when a strange Indian arrives with you, he is sent to make his fire in the woods, and gets nothing to eat. I now hear the contrary from all who have visited you, for they have all been fed and lodged. In other places they make wry faces at us; here, men, women, and even children, bid us welcome."

By this time the Christian Indians had in a very great degree gained the confidence and esteem of their pagan neighbours; so that even some of the captains and chiefs interested themselves in their behalf, demanding that they should enjoy perfect liberty of conscience, and be protected in their possessions against every intruder. This was formally ratified by an act of the council in the name of the whole Delaware nation; in which they gave full permission to any of their people, who were so disposed, to go and hear the gospel. This act was shortly after renewed, and accompanied with an urgent request on their part, that the Brethren would form a third settlement.

This proposal was readily agreed to, and they fixed on a spot on the east side of the Muskingum, to which they gave the name of Lichtenau. In April 1776 the missionaries Zeisberger and Heckewaelder, with eight families of Christian Indians from Schoenbrunn, moved to this new settlement. It soon increased in number and extent, by the accession of many heathen, who became obedient to the gospel. The number of inhabitants in the three settlements on the Muskingum amounted now to four hundred and fourteen persons, and, as they lay at no great distance from each other, a pleasing intercourse was constantly kept up between them, which contributed not a little to the encouragement of the missionaries, and the edification of their converts.

This prosperity of the mission received a sudden check, in consequence of the rupture between Great Britain and her colonies. By this time the contest had risen so high, that the disturbances it occasioned reached to the Ohio and the Muskingum. The Brethren, indeed, determined to take no part in the war, yet they were placed in the most critical situation, as their very neutrality served to render them suspicious in the eyes of each of the belligerent powers, and threw a general odium upon their character and conduct.

During the consecutive commotions the chiefs of the Delawares firmly adhered to their resolution not to interfere with the war. But a tribe of that nation, the Monsys, secretly separated from the main body and formed an alliance with the Mingoes, a set of idle thieves and murderers. They endeavoured to gain a party among the enemies of the mission, and even ventured into the settlements in order to decoy some of the inhabitants to join them, in which they were but too successful. They found a party of apostates, who seemed intent upon overthrowing Christianity, and replacing paganism in its room. This was the severest stroke the missionaries had yet met with, and occasioned them far more poignant grief than all their former sufferings. They spared no pains, which love could dictate, to recover these poor backsliders from this snare of the devil; but all in vain. It afterwards appeared that the Monsys and the apostate party had nothing less in view, than either to murder the missionaries, or convey them to Fort Detroit; the firmness of the Delawares in maintaining peace being ascribed to the influence of the Brethren on their council. And when this attempt did not succeed, they spread the false, though probable report, that the missionaries and their congregations were daily in danger of being surprised and murdered by the Huron warriors.

Rather, therefore, than enter into a dispute with so dangerous an enemy, they resolved to abandon Schoenbrunn, and move to Lichtenau. They now found the contiguity of this settlement to the Indian town of Goshachguenk of essential advantage, as they could not have defended themselves against the insults of the warriors, had they not met with constant support from the chiefs and council of that place. A part of the fugitive congregation settled at Gnadenhuetten.

In August 1777 intelligence reached Lichtenau that two hundred Huron warriors, headed by one of their chiefs, called by way of distinction the half-king, were on their march to that place. This caused considerable alarm; but after mature consideration the missionaries resolved to betray no symptoms of fear, but rather seek to conciliate their favour by kind treatment. No time was lost to prepare provisions for them; and the liberality of the Christian Indians, on this occasion, was the more remarkable, as they considered it the only means of saving the lives of their beloved teachers. The warriors expressed no little surprise and pleasure on being met by a party from Lichtenau, bringing provisions for them. This put them into a very good humour; and the Christian Indians did not neglect to improve this favourable opportunity, but sent a formal embassy to the half-king and the other chiefs of the Hurons, informing them that they had embraced Christianity, and now wished to live in peace with all men; and therefore requested protection and safety for themselves and their teachers. This message was well received by the half-king, and he exhorted the Christian Indians to obey their teachers, attend to their worship, and not to mind other affairs; promising that no one should molest or hurt them.

While these negociations were pending, the inhabitants of Lichtenau were not without serious apprehensions, being uncertain what turn affairs would take. The deputies had, therefore, agreed that should the half-king speak in an angry tone, they would immediately despatch a messenger to the settlement, thereby affording time to the congregation to take flight before he had concluded his speech. The greater, consequently, was their joy, when the embassy terminated so favourably.

The same day the half-king, attended by the chief captain and eighty-two warriors, visited Lichtenau. They were so amply supplied with provisions, that they were able to carry a considerable quantity home with them. Similar visits were repeated in the sequel: and sometimes more than two hundred warriors of different nations took up their night-quarters close to the settlement, and behaved so quietly, that their presence was hardly perceived. For the half-king maintained strict discipline, and took every precaution to prevent drunkenness, being well aware that this would terminate in bloodshed and murder. He was so pleased with the reception he and his retinue had met with, that he took the missionaries by the hand and called them father, desiring that they would consider him and his people as children. He even sent messengers to the English government in Detroit and to the chiefs in the Huron country, informing them of the alliance made with the Christian Indians, adding, that he and his warriors had acknowledged the white brethren to be their father, and would ever own them as such. The maintenance of so many warriors, however, was attended with considerable expense and trouble; the inhabitants of the settlement, therefore, were glad, when, towards the end of August, they finally removed from that part of the country.

The situation of Lichtenau and Gnadenhuetten now became every day more dangerous. It was, therefore, deemed expedient to lessen the number of missionaries, leaving only one in each of the settlements. As the distance between the two places was only twenty miles, they kept up, as far as possible, a regular intercourse, and in travelling through the country found the friendship made with the Hurons of great advantage. Yet they saw little before them but perplexity and distress. Various terrifying reports were in circulation, which rendered it necessary for the two congregations to hold themselves in constant readiness for a precipitate flight. Canoes were provided and a place of rendezvous appointed; and one night they actually fled, in consequence of a report, that the enemy was approaching. Fortunately this proved a false alarm; and after spending a day together in the place of rendezvous, the two congregations could return in peace to their respective dwellings.

Every part of the country now exhibited scenes of the most dreadful cruelty. The Hurons, who were in league with the English, committed the most horrid murders and ravages on the white people and their plantations, and the Americans treated the Indians with little less ferocity. It was a melancholy spectacle to see the savages drag along men, women and children, whom they had made prisoners, and many of whom were severely wounded, and carry dead bodies and scalps, as trophies of victory, through the settlements. The Christian Indians showed the prisoners all the compassion and attention in their power, and would never suffer them to be scourged, or otherwise abused, while in the place, as is the custom in the Indian towns. Among the prisoners a venerable old man and two youths more particularly excited their pity. When the warriors arrived with them in their own town, the two youths were tortured and burnt to death. The old man was condemned to suffer the same punishment, but, receiving timely information, he effected his escape. Some of the Christian Indians found him in the woods, almost dead, having had nothing but grass to eat for fourteen days. They brought him to Lichtenau, where he was well cared for, and after regaining his strength they sent him to Pittsburgh. The governor of that place acknowledged the conduct of the Indian congregation to have been of real benefit to the whole country, and that the fury of the warriors had been considerably mitigated by the example and influence of their Christian countrymen.

Hitherto the Delawares had firmly adhered to their resolution to take no part in the war; at length, however, they were induced to join the English against the Americans. Their friendship for the missionaries and Christian Indians was now changed into enmity, considering them, on account of their peaceful disposition, as a check to their conduct. The council unanimously resolved that the hatchet should fall on the head of every one who refused to accept it; and as the Indians in league with the Americans formed a similar resolution, our congregations were placed between two cruel enemies, and saw nothing before them but inevitable ruin. The missionaries, in particular, were exposed to the most imminent danger, as it was ascribed to their authority and influence that the young men in our settlements had declined the challenge, repeatedly sent by the Delaware chiefs, to take up arms. The savages, therefore, reiterated their threats, that the missionaries should be either killed or made prisoners; flattering themselves, that if they were removed, the Christian Indians would soon be forced to comply.

But God knew how to preserve his servants; and his guardian care over them was often displayed in a most striking manner. Repeated attempts to carry them prisoners to fort Detroit were frustrated. At one time brother Shebosh got between two parties, who were in pursuit of each other, and did not know his danger till after his escape. The preservation experienced by Zeisberger was still more singular. Being on a journey with two Indian brethren, he was met by a white man, who headed a murderous party of eight Mingoes and a prisoner. As soon as he observed the missionary, he called out to his party: "Here is the man we have long wished to secure; do now as you think proper." The Mingoe captain shook his head, and after asking a few questions, walked off. The English, indeed, acknowledged that the missionaries had done no harm, but were even useful in civilizing the Indians; yet they wished to carry them away prisoners, being persuaded that if they were removed, not only the Delawares but many other tribes would join the army.

It has already been mentioned that Schoenbrunn was forsaken by the faithful part of the congregation, almost at the very beginning of these troubles; and as they were now chiefly felt at Gnadenhuetten, it was deemed expedient to remove that congregation also, and to concentrate the whole mission at Lichtenau. This was effected in April 1778; and in order to make room for this increase of inhabitants, several new houses were built, and the chapel was enlarged. In the sequel, however, it appeared that this settlement was too much crowded. A resolution was, therefore, taken in 1779, to rebuild Schoenbrunn, though not on the same spot, but on the opposite bank of the Muskingum. And as Lichtenau, which had hitherto been the safest place, now became more and more exposed to the outrages of the heathen, the missionaries in 1780 deemed it necessary to quit this place also, and to erect a new settlement at the distance of about twenty miles, which they called Salem.

Amidst all the disturbances occasioned by the daily marches of warriors through the settlements, the Christian Indians did not lose their courage; and these very troubles led them to cleave more steadfastly to the Lord and seek help from him. The grace of God was sensibly felt in all their meetings; great numbers of heathen Indians attended the preaching of the gospel, and the emotion was frequently so general, that the preacher had to stop in his discourse, as the loud weeping of his audience overpowered his voice. Many were baptized; and some who had been baptized in other communities were received as members of the Brethren's church. The assistants were peculiarly zealous and successful in bearing testimony of the truth to their countrymen. For this purpose they made frequent visits to the neighbouring towns. A great awakening likewise took place among the young, as yet unbaptized children, who with tears begged for admission to this holy rite. Such was the powerful influence of the gospel in the congregation, that the members not only loved each other with a pure heart fervently, but extended their charity to their worst enemies, constantly praying for them, and doing them every kind service in their power. The apostate part of the congregation who left Schoenbrunn, was more particularly the object of their prayers. They were graciously answered; for most of these poor deluded people returned, like the prodigal son, earnestly begging for pardon and re-admission. This was granted in presence of the whole congregation, whose tears of compassion and joy on these occasions realized the words of Christ: Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, and do good to them that hate you; and pray for them which despitefully use and persecute you. Matt. v. 44.

By these means, the new settlement in Salem soon began to flourish; and, notwithstanding the pressure of the times, the bounty of God so richly provided the inhabitants with food and raiment, that they could supply the wants of many of their starving and suffering countrymen.

Our Indian congregations now enjoyed a season of rest, seldom witnessing any thing of war, except that troops sometimes marched through the settlements. But this happy tranquillity terminated in less than a year, and new scenes of unprecedented distress commenced. The English governor at Fort Detroit, influenced by the calumnies of the adversaries, began to entertain a suspicion that the Christian Indians were partizans with the Americans, and that the missionaries acted as spies. In order to rid himself of such troublesome and dangerous neighbours, he sent a message to the Iroquois and several other tribes, to take up the Indian congregations and their teachers and carry them away. But these tribes declined acceding to the proposal. A similar message was then sent to the half-king of the Hurons. This man, instigated by the Delaware captain, Pipe, a sworn enemy to the mission, at length agreed to commit this act of injustice; declaring at the same time, that he only did it with a view to save the Christian Indians, whom he had formerly treated with every mark of friendship.

In August, 1781, a troop of warriors, amounting to upwards of three hundred, commanded by the half-king, the Delaware captain, Pipe, and an English captain, made their appearance, and fixed upon Gnadenhuetten, as the most convenient place for holding a consultation with the Christian Indians. At this meeting the half-king and his retinue put on the mask of friendship, and proposed their removal as a measure dictated by regard for their safety. This proposal the Christian Indians declined, promising, however, to consider their words, and return an answer the next winter.

The half-king would probably have been satisfied with this answer, had not the English officer and Captain Pipe urged him to persevere. The consequence was, that the hostile party became more peremptory in their demands, insisting on the removal of the congregation. Their vengeance was particularly directed against the missionaries, and they held frequent consultations, in which they resolved to murder all the white brethren and sisters, and even the Indian assistants. But before they executed their bloody purpose, they inquired the opinion of a common warrior, who was held in great esteem as a sorcerer. He was decidedly against the measure, and said: "You have resolved to kill my dearest friends; for most of their chief people are my friends. But this I tell you, that if you hurt any of them, I know what I will do." This threat so terrified them, that they relinquished their design.

Meanwhile the savages became more daring and riotous. Though they were supplied with every thing they wanted by the Christian Indians, they wantonly shot their cattle and pigs. Small parties made inroads into the adjacent country and brought their prisoners to Gnadenhuetten; thus turning it into a theatre of war and pillage.

At length the half-king summoned all the missionaries and their Indian assistants from the three settlements before a council of war, asking them what they intended to do? As they appealed to the answer already given, the assembly broke up without further debate. A Delaware captain then stepped up to brother Zeisberger, telling him, that being adopted one of the Delaware nation, the warriors were willing to protect him. But as this protection extended only to himself and not to his fellow-labourers, he nobly declined it. Upon this he and the two other missionaries were immediately seized and declared prisoners of war. As they were dragged into the camp, a Huron Indian aimed a push at brother Senseman's head with a kind of lance, but fortunately missed his aim. A Monsy then stepped forward, seized the missionaries by the hair, and shaking them, tauntingly exclaimed: "Welcome among us, my friends!"

Upon this they were led into the camp of the Delawares, who sang the death-song, stripped them of all their clothes except their shirts, and led them into the tent of the English officer, who, seeing their pitiable condition, declared that, though the governor of Detroit had given positive orders to secure them, this treatment was contrary to his intention. Having received a few rags to cover them, they were confined in two huts, belonging to the camp of the Hurons, and joined by the missionary Edwards, who, though he might have escaped, preferred sharing the same fate with his brethren. However, they were not bound like other prisoners; but a strict watch was set over them. Here they were obliged to sit on the bare ground, and, having scarce any covering, suffered severely from the cold.

Soon after their confinement, they saw a number of armed warriors march off for Salem and Schoenbrunn. The apprehension of what their families might suffer was far more distressing to them than all the indignities offered to their own persons. When the savages arrived at the settlements they plundered the mission-houses and chapels, wantonly destroying the furniture, and took the remaining missionaries and their wives and children prisoners, singing the death-song, as they led them away. None was more to be pitied than sister Senseman. She had been delivered of a child only three days before, and now she was in a dark, and rainy night, hurried away by these merciless barbarians. By the mercy of God, however, neither she nor her infant received the least injury. It was indeed a providential circumstance that she was able to walk, otherwise the savages, according to their usual practice, would instantly have murdered both mother and child. Early in the morning of September 4th this company arrived at Gnadenhuetten. The feelings of the brethren Senseman and Zeisberger on seeing their wives brought prisoners into the camp, where they were confined themselves, may more easily be conceived than described. Thus six missionaries, three of their wives and two children were at once dragged away from their pleasant and peaceful habitations, exposed to all the horrors of captivity in a camp of Indian warriors, and to constant dread, lest these savages should gratify their thirst for blood, by torturing and murdering them.

But that God who rescued Peter and Paul and Silas from the hands of their persecutors, preserved also the lives of these his devoted servants, and sent them deliverance. The very next day the prisoners obtained permission to see and speak with each other. The scene now exhibited was so affecting, that it struck the very savages with remorse and astonishment. The sisters, who showed wonderful composure and resignation, were soon set at liberty, together with the missionary Jungman. The mission-house being nearly destroyed, they went to the house of brother Shebosh, who being considered a native, as he had completely adopted the Indian manner of living, and married one of their countrywomen, had not been taken prisoner. Mutual visits were now allowed to those who had been liberated, and their friends who were still in confinement.

At the beginning of these troubles the behaviour of the Christian Indians bore some resemblance to the conduct of the disciples of Jesus, when he was betrayed: they forsook their teachers and fled. However, when they met together in the woods, they wept so loud, that the air resounded with their lamentations; and, soon recovering from their panic, they returned; and having retaken, or bought, several articles stolen by the savages, restored them to the owners. Late in the evening they carried blankets to the missionaries, who were still in prison, and fetched them away early in the morning, lest the savages should steal them in the course of the day.

After the lapse of four days, during which the five imprisoned missionaries had experienced all the horrors of being at the mercy of a set of robbers and murderers, the Indian assistants took courage and applied to the half-king and the other captains for the liberation of their teachers. The savages, being by this time convinced that the Christian Indians would never remove from the settlements, unless they were conducted by the missionaries, summoned them before the council, set them at liberty, and advised them to encourage their converts to emigrate.

Filled with thanks and praises to God, they now returned to their beloved people, and having directed them all to meet at Salem, they once more celebrated the Lord's Supper with them, during a remarkable perception of the presence of God and the influence of his Spirit. Here they spent some days in peace and comfort, preached the gospel with boldness, baptized one of the catechumens, and exhorted the believers to evince the sincerity of their faith, by acting with firmness and resignation in this season of trial. The Christian Indians, convinced that there was no alternative left them but to emigrate, the more readily acquiesced in the proposed measure, as about a hundred of the savages, who had constantly watched their motions, and surrounded them at a distance, now entered the settlement, and behaved like madmen, committing the most daring outrages.

But never did the Brethren leave any country with greater regret. They had already lost about two hundred horned cattle, and four hundred hogs; and now they were obliged to leave a great quantity of corn in their stores, besides three hundred acres, just ready to be reaped, together with potatoes and other vegetables and garden fruits. According to a moderate calculation their loss was computed at two thousand pounds; no trifling sum to be the property of Indians, and which strikingly shows the tendency of true religion to promote industry and improvement. But what gave the missionaries the most pain was the total loss of all their books and manuscripts, which they had translated and compiled with great labour for the instruction of the Indian youth, all of which were now burned by the savages. Add to this, they saw nothing before them but distress, misery and danger. But there was no alternative; they could only possess their souls in patience, and go even whither they would not, relying on the help of God.

They were escorted by a troop of savages, commanded by English officers, who enclosed them on all sides at the distance of some miles. In a few days the half-king of the Hurons and his warriors overtook them, and proceeded with the rest. One party went by water, and another by land. By the sinking of some of their canoes, those who were in them lost all their property, but, fortunately, saved their lives. Those who went by land drove the cattle. The journey was exceedingly tedious and troublesome, and for the greater part of the way lay through a swamp. The savages frequently drove them forward like a herd of cattle. The missionaries and their wives, surrounded by the Christian Indians, usually travelled in the middle. But one morning, when the latter could not set out as expeditiously as their conductors wanted, they forced the missionaries away alone, whipping their horses till they became unmanageable, and would not even allow time to the mothers to suckle their infants. The Christian Indians followed as fast as possible, but, with all their exertions, did not come up with them till night; and thus it was morning before they were rescued from the hands of the savages. Notwithstanding these and many other difficulties, they pursued their journey with the utmost patience. Not one left the congregation; not one laid the blame on others; no dissatisfaction or dissension arose among them, but they were united in the spirit of true brotherly love, rejoicing in God their Saviour; and even held their daily meetings for worship.

After a journey of about four weeks they arrived at Sandusky creek, about one hundred and twenty-five miles distant from the settlements on the Muskingum. Here the half-king and his warriors left them, marching into their own country, without giving them any further directions. Thus abandoned, in a country where there was neither game nor any other kind of provisions, though it had been represented to them by these barbarians as a perfect paradise, they roved to and fro for some time, and at last resolved to spend the winter in Upper Sandusky. Having pitched upon the best spot they could find in this dreary wilderness, they erected small huts of logs and bark, to shelter themselves from the wet and cold. This was the more necessary, as their savage conductors had stolen all their blankets and other articles, only leaving them the needful utensils for making maple sugar. Their want of provisions at length became so great, that the missionary Shebosh and some Indian brethren returned to the forsaken settlements on the Muskingum, to fetch the Indian corn, which had been left standing in the fields. This was a hazardous enterprize. Shebosh and five of the Indians were actually taken prisoners and carried to Pittsburgh; but the rest returned safely, with four hundred bushels of corn, to Sandusky. Though many heathen visited this neighbourhood, they showed no disposition to hear the gospel, but rather scoffed at it. Captain Pipe boasted, that he had taken the brethren prisoners, and considered them now as his slaves. The half-king informed them, that being now under his dominion, they were bound to obey all his mandates, and even to go to war at his command. The less prospect there appeared, under these circumstances, of being instrumental in the conversion of the heathen, the more joy the missionaries felt at seeing several, who at the commencement of the troubles, had wandered from the congregation, return to the Shepherd and Bishop of souls, and join his persecuted flock.

Scarce had the Christian Indians begun to establish themselves at Sandusky, when the missionaries and the chiefs of their people received an order from the governor at Fort Detroit, to repair thither. Glad of this opportunity to speak for themselves, and refute the many lies propagated respecting them, four of the missionaries, accompanied by as many of the assistants, set out for that place on the 25th of October. Some days elapsed before the investigation of the various charges, brought against them, could take place, as their principal accuser, Captain Pipe, had not yet arrived.

Without entering into a minute detail of the trial, suffice it to say, that Pipe, after some fruitless evasions, was obliged to confess, that the missionaries were innocent, and to take all the blame to himself and the chiefs. After making some further inquiries, the governor declared publicly, that the missionaries were innocent of all the charges brought against them, that he viewed their endeavours to civilize and christianize the Indians with great satisfaction, and would permit them to return to their congregation without delay. He then addressed the Indian assistants in a very condescending manner, admonished them to obey their teachers, and gratuitously supplied them with all they wanted. He offered the use of his own house to the missionaries, and as, contrary to his express orders, they had been plundered, he provided them with clothes and every other necessary, and even repurchased four watches of which they had been robbed when made prisoners. Thankful for the gracious interposition of God in their behalf, they arrived again at Sandusky on November 22d, to the inexpressible joy of their families and the whole congregation, who had entertained serious apprehensions, that they would be kept prisoners in Detroit.

Our Indians at Sandusky now enjoyed a temporary rest. They erected a chapel, assembled for daily worship, and great grace prevailed among them. Some new people were baptized, and others, who had gone astray, were again restored to the fellowship of the believers. But with regard to externals, their situation was distressing in the extreme. Often they knew not to-day what they should eat to-morrow, and absolute famine stared them in the face. Provisions were scarce and could be bought only at a most exorbitant price. The unusual severity of the winter increased the distress. They had considerable herds of cattle, but there was no forage for them in this dreary region, in consequence of which, numbers perished. Many of the poor lived entirely on wild potatoes; and the famine at last rose to such a pitch, that they greedily ate the carcases of horses and cows, that were starved to death.

Compelled by the horrors of famine, several parties returned to the forsaken settlements on the Muskingum, where the corn was still standing unreaped in the fields, and was even then better in quality, than what was offered for sale, at an enormous price, in Sandusky. A report likewise prevailed, that the danger in those parts had ceased; but in crediting this, they found themselves most fatally deceived. A scene of treachery and bloodshed was soon after exhibited in this very quarter, to which it would be difficult to find a parallel in the history of the greatest barbarians of any age or nation.

About this time the governor of Pittsburgh released those Christian Indians who, together with the missionary Shebosh, had been taken prisoners by the Americans. This act of common justice greatly incensed the white people, who represented the Indians as a set of Canaanites, that ought to be extirpated from the face of the earth.* Having heard that parties of Christian Indians from Sandusky came occasionally to the Muskingum, to fetch provisions, about one hundred and sixty of these ruffians formed a plot to surprise them, destroy the settlements, and then proceed to Sandusky and murder the rest of the congregation. As soon as Colonel Gibson at Pittsburgh received intelligence of this infernal plot, he sent information of it to the Muskingum, to warn the Indians of their danger: but the messengers arrived too late. Our Indians indeed had received timely notice of danger from another quarter, but, contrary to their usual caution and timidity, paid no regard to the information, supposing that they now had nothing to fear from the Americans.

In this instance their confidence was fatally misplaced. Early in March, 1782, the murderers approached Gnadenhuetten. About a mile from the settlement they met young Shebosh, the son of the missionary, fired at and wounded him so severely, that he was unable to escape. He then, according to their own account, begged for his life, representing that he was the son of a white man. Regardless of his entreaties, they cut him in pieces with their hatchets. Proceeding onward they reached the plantations, where many Indians were at work. They accosted them in friendly terms, and desired them to go home, promising that no one should molest them. They even pretended to pity them on account of their past sufferings, and assured them of the protection and friendship of the Americans. The Christian Indians, ignorant of the murder of young Shebosh, believed all they said, and treated them in the most hospitable manner. And when ordered by these murderers not to return to Sandusky, but go to Pittsburgh, they submitted with resignation, hoping that God, in his providence, would by this means put a stop to their sufferings. Prepossessed with this idea, they cheerfully delivered their guns, hatchets and other weapons, and even showed them where they had secreted their property in the woods.

Meanwhile John Martin, one of the Indian assistants, went to Salem to inform the inhabitants of the arrival of the Americans, assuring them they were come as friends in order to conduct the Christian Indians to a place of safety. Those at Salem received this intelligence without regret, persuading themselves that God, by the instrumentality of the Americans, would release them from their present disagreeable situation; and fondly hoping that, being once arrived at Pittsburgh, they would not find it difficult to form a settlement in some convenient spot, and procure advice and assistance from Bethlehem. John Martin, having returned to Gnadenhuetten, acquainted both the Christian Indians and the Americans with their resolution. The latter having expressed a desire to see Salem, a party of them was conducted thither and most hospitably entertained. Here they feigned the same friendship as at Gnadenhuetten, and even affected great piety, entering into much religious discourse with the Indians.

Having by these hypocritical arts completely succeeded in deceiving the unsuspecting Indians, they at once threw off the mask, and displayed all the hideous deformity of their real character. They suddenly attacked the poor, defenceless inhabitants of Gnadenhuetten, seized and bound them. Those coming from Salem shared a similar fate. Before they entered Gnadenhuetten they were surprised by their conductors, robbed of their guns and even of their pocket-knives, and brought bound into the settlement. A council was held, and by a plurality of votes, it was resolved to murder them all the next day. The few who opposed this inhuman resolution wrung their hands, calling God to witness that they were innocent of the blood of these harmless Indians. But the majority remained inflexible, only differing as to the mode of execution. Some proposed burning them alive, others scalping them. The latter mode was finally fixed upon. They then despatched a messenger to the prisoners, to tell them, that as they were Christians, they might prepare themselves for death in a Christian manner, for they must all die on the morrow.

* See p. 520.

It may easily be conceived, that this dreadful intelligence overwhelmed the prisoners with horror. But, soon recollecting themselves, they patiently submitted to these bloodthirsty tyrants. Being allowed one night's respite, they spent it in prayer and in exhorting one another to remain faithful until death. At the dawn of morning they united in solemn hymns of praise, in the joyful hope that they should soon enter into the glorious presence of God their Saviour, and join the song of the ransomed before the throne of the Lamb.

When the day of execution (March 8th) arrived, the murderers fixed upon two houses; one for the men, the other for the women and children; to which they gave the name of slaughter-houses. The carnage immediately commenced; and these poor innocent people, men women and children, being bound with ropes, two and two together, were led into the houses, and there scalped and murdered. By this act of most wanton barbarity, ninety-six persons finished their earthly existence, among whom there were five valuable assistants in the mission, and thirty-four children. According to the testimony of the murderers themselves, they displayed uncommon patience, and met death with cheerful resignation, and in full assurance of a glorious resurrection to life eternal.

It appears from all the circumstances attending this bloody catastrophe, that they were not murdered because they were Christians, but merely because they were Indians. We cannot, therefore, compare them with the martyrs of the primitive church, who died for their testimony of Jesus; but this we may confidently affirm, that they met death, even in the most formidable shape, with all the meekness and fortitude of Christ's true disciples, and to the end of their lives bore witness to the truth and efficacy of the gospel. Their very murderers acknowledged that they were good Indians, "For," said they, "they sang and prayed to their latest breath."

Only two youths escaped this dreadful massacre, and that in a manner almost miraculous. The one fortunately disengaged himself from his bonds, and unobserved crept through a narrow window into the cellar of one of the slaughter-houses. Here he soon observed the blood drop through the floor and run in streams into the cellar; which makes it probable that tho murderers not only scalped their victims, but cut them in pieces. Remaining concealed in the cellar during the night, he with much difficulty made his way out the next morning, and fled into an adjacent thicket. The escape of the other youth was equally remarkable. His murderers gave him only one blow on the head, took his scalp and left him. In a while he recovered his senses, and saw himself surrounded with bleeding corpses; among whom he observed one called Abel, still moving and endeavouring to raise himself. But he lay quite still, as though he had been dead; and this caution proved the means of his deliverance; for one of the murderers coming in, and observing Abel move, gave him two or three blows, which killed him. The other, though suffering excruciating pain from his wounds, remained quiet. A while after he ventured to creep towards the door, and not seeing any person near, escaped into the woods, where he concealed himself during the night. Here he met his companion, and they pursued their journey to Sandusky. Though they purposely took a circuitous route, on which they encountered great dangers and suffered many hardships, yet they were graciously preserved. Before they left their place of concealment, they observed the wretches making merry, congratulating themselves on the success of their enterprize, and setting fire to the slaughter-houses.

The Christian Indians at Schoenbrunn fortunately escaped the destruction equally meditated against them. Having despatched a messenger on some business to Gnadenhuetten, he found young Shebosh lying dead and scalped by the way; and looking forward, saw a number of Americans in and about the settlement. Alarmed at this, he returned to Shoenbrunn with the utmost precipitation, informing the inhabitants of what he had seen. Upon this they all fled into the woods. From their lurking-places they observed the murderers approach the town; who, finding no one at home, set fire to the houses, as they had also done at Gnadenhuetten and Salem. Taking the scalps of their innocent victims, about fifty horses, some blankets and other things with them, they proceeded to Pittsburgh, with a view to murder the colony of Indians lately settled on the north side of the Ohio; which diabolical design they partially effected.

While this tragical scene was acting on the banks of the Muskingum, the missionaries at Sandusky were not without their troubles. Some members of the congregation had apostatized from the faith, and excited no small disturbance and uneasiness by their endeavours to seduce others, as well as by their own obstinacy, bidding defiance to all remonstrances, and treating even the kindest reproof with contempt and ridicule. But a heavier trial than this was preparing for them. The enemies of the Brethren were still plotting the destruction of the mission. The governor of Detroit, unwilling to break his promise that no one should molest them in their labours, resisted every base insinuation against them as far as lay in his power. At length, however, all his measures of firmness and prudence proved ineffectual; and he was in a manner forced, though very reluctantly, to give the half-king of the Hurons and an English officer in his company, an order to bring all the missionaries and their families to fort Detroit; adding, however, a strict charge neither to plunder nor abuse them.

The missionaries were panic-struck at this order: to be torn from their beloved flock was a far severer blow to them than death itself. But no choice was allowed them, and submission to the inscrutable ways of divine Providence became their imperious duty; for the slightest remonstrance might have subjected them to ill treatment and plunder, and could not have been of the smallest service. When this order was made known to the congregation, a most affecting and overwhelming scene was exhibited. The whole assembly burst into loud lamentations and almost crushed the spirit of the missionaries, already sufficiently oppressed by their own weight of sorrow. The Indians, who are wont to endure the most cruel tortures without a tear or a groan, now wept like children bereaved of their parents; and in broken accents, as their half-stifled emotions would give them utterance, exclaimed, "We are left as sheep without a shepherd!" "Ah!" said one, "it gives me no concern that I am poor and hungry and have lost all my substance. Gladly would I suffer all this and much more, but that our enemies are taking our teachers from us, and intend to rob our souls of nourishment and deprive us of salvation; this is more than I can bear. But they shall never entice me to adopt their heathenish practices, or force me to do things abominable in the sight of God my Saviour. No; I will rather run into the thickest wood, fly from all human society, and spend the remainder of my days in penury and wretchedness."

Heart-rending as this scene was to them, their sorrow had not yet reached its height. They were still ignorant of the tragical events on the Muskingum; and it was not till the day before their departure, that they received the first appalling tidings of that dreadful catastrophe by an Indian warrior who came from those parts. And as this information was not in every respect correct, they were left to figure things to themselves even more dreadful than they were. By what they could collect from this relation, one part of the Christian Indians had been murdered, and another carried prisoners to Pittsburgh.

In this state of mind, overpowered with grief for the past, and agitated by fears for the future, they took leave of their congregation at Sandusky. Brother Zeisberger, after exhorting them with the affection of a father, to remain faithful to Jesus unto death, and apply to Him in all their need and distress, as the only permanent source of comfort, salvation and life, kneeled down with the whole assembly, offered grateful praises to the Lord for all the spiritual blessings he had bestowed upon them in the midst of great temporal misery, and fervently commended them to the protection and preservation of the triune God.

In March, 1782, they left Sandusky, and were accompanied a considerable part of the way by a great number of their weeping flock; and by some even as far as Lower Sandusky. Here they were detained for some time, waiting for vessels to carry them across lake Erie to Detroit. The vessels at length arrived with a written order to treat the missionaries with all possible kindness, and in case of stormy weather not to endanger their lives by crossing the lake. Having arrived at Detroit on the 11th of April, they were lodged in a part of the barracks which had just been fitted up for officers' dwellings. The governor soon called to see them, assuring them that though many accusations had been brought against them, yet he was fully convinced of their innocence, and had not sent for them on that account, but merely for their own safety, having received the most authentic intelligence that they were exposed to imminent danger while they remained at Sandusky. He also left it to their own option, whether they would remain at Detroit, or go to Bethlehem. With his consent they removed from the barracks to a private house at a short distance from the town.

The Indian congregation, meanwhile, was placed in the most precarious situation. The assistants, indeed, continued the daily meetings, and faithfully exhorted their brethren to remain steadfast. An English trader who visited Sandusky, bore a pleasing testimony to this. He related that he heard them sing hymns and exhort each other, till they wept together like children. But, encouraging as this was, some false brethren now manifested the perfidy of their hearts. They ascribed all their misfortunes, and even the murder on the Muskingum, to the missionaries. Besides, the half-king of the Hurons, being incessantly tormented with the pangs of a guilty conscience, had no rest as long as any Christian Indians remained in his neighbourhood. He therefore sent them a peremptory order to quit the country altogether. Indeed it appeared as if no place were left where these poor, persecuted Indians might find rest for the soles of their feet. They could expect no protection from the white people, and the heathen proscribed them as outlaws. As their dispersion seemed unavoidable, they resolved to make no resistance. One party went into the country of the Shawanose, and another settled in the vicinity of Pipestown, with a view to proceed further to the banks of the Miami. Thus a temporary stop was put to the once flourishing mission among the Indians.

The various afflictive and dreadful occurrences just related, bore every mark of a mysterious and inscrutable Providence, impenetrable to the view of short-sighted man, and only calculated to elicit in his servants a bold effort of faith, to hope even against hope. By degrees, however, the dark clouds dispersed; the veil which had concealed the secret operations of the divine hand, was at least partially withdrawn, and they were enabled to discern rays of almighty love, power and wisdom in this darkest of dispensations, constraining them gratefully to exclaim: The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth! He will restrain the power of the enemy and the fury of the oppressor, and cause all things to work together for good to them that love Him.

Though the removal of the Christian Indians from their settlements on the Muskingum caused great distress at the time; yet it was, in fact, a most gracious interposition of divine Providence; for had not this measure been rendered absolutely necessary, it is more than probable that the whole congregation would have been involved in the massacre at Gnadenhuetten; but in consequence of their emigration to Sandusky, more than two-thirds escaped. Had not the missionaries received orders to repair to Detroit, they would not then have thought of sending a messenger to the Muskingum, to call the Indians away, and thus the inhabitants of Schoenbrunn would have shared the same fate with their murdered brethren at Gnadenhuetten. For the arrival of the messenger from Sandusky at the former place, required that the message he had brought should be also carried to the other settlements; and the Indian entrusted with this was the person who, as mentioned before, saw young Shebosh lying dead by the road, and spread the alarm at Schoenbrunn, thereby affording time to the inhabitants to save themselves by flight.

But the good resulting from the removal of the missionaries to Detroit did not terminate here. The same gang of murderers, who had committed the massacre on the Muskingum, did not abandon their bloody design against the rest of the congregation, though they deferred its execution for a while. A few weeks after the dispersion from Sandusky, these miscreants came hither, but finding the place deserted, their cruel purpose was providentially defeated. Soon after this disappointment divine justice overtook them, for being attacked by a party of English and Indian warriors, the greater part of them were cut to pieces.

We now resume the history of the mission.

The missionaries in Detroit did not avail themselves of the governor's permission to go to Bethlehem; a sense of duty and affection induced them to seek the welfare of their poor, dispersed Indian flock. To promote this they resolved to build a new settlement and invite their converts to return to them. Through the interest of the governor, who highly approved this measure, they obtained from the Chippeways a grant of land, about thirty miles north of Detroit, on the banks of the Huron. The governor continued his kind assistance in various ways; he furnished them with provisions, boats, planks and other necessary articles from the royal stores, and gave them some horses and cows; and his lady presented them with a valuable assortment of seeds and roots. He even sent a message with a string of wampum to all the dispersed Christian Indians, inviting them to return to their teachers. Several families soon collected, so that in the month of July 1782, they had the pleasure of beginning the erection of the new settlement, which they called New Gnadenhuetten.

During their residence at Detroit they had had frequent opportunities of preaching the gospel both in the English and German languages; they were often applied to to baptize children and bury the dead; and brother Zeisberger delivered several discourses to the prisoners, which were attended by many inhabitants of the town.

The industry of the missionaries, aided by a favourable soil and other advantages, soon changed the new settlement, which before had been a perfect wilderness, into a fruitful and pleasant spot, but its colonization by the Christian Indians proceeded rather slowly. The greater part of them still remained scattered among the heathen, chiefly in the county of Twichtwees, about two hundred and fifty miles south of New Gnadenhuetten. The missionaries omitted no opportunity of sending them verbal messages; but from interested motives these were frequently perverted by the bearers, and the adversaries endeavoured to keep alive their imaginary fears of the white people, especially of the English government. Some of the native chiefs also terrified them by commanding them to be resigned to their fate, and resume the manners of the heathen, adding, "that not a single word of the gospel should any more be heard in the Indian country."

Notwithstanding the wily arts of the pagans to hinder the Christian Indians from returning to their teachers, many by degrees collected together on the river Huron. The new settlement was frequently visited, both by white people and heathen, who admired the regulations and improvements of the place. The missionaries exerted their accustomed zeal in preaching the gospel and instructing their flock. A few yielded to the converting influence of the word of God, and were baptized, and the internal course of the congregation was encouraging and edifying.

In May 1783 they joined their neighbours in thanksgiving to God for the restoration of peace between England and the United States of America.

The ensuing winter was marked by a very intense frost, continuing late in the spring. Being wholly unexpected, it occasioned great scarcity, and obliged our Indians to disperse through the country. They were often reduced to extreme want, and forced to live on wild roots, till God was pleased to relieve their necessities by a large herd of deer, which strayed into the neighbourhood. During this time of scarcity they unavoidably contracted considerable debt with the traders in Detroit, but these were now so well convinced of their industry and honesty, that they gave them credit without hesitation. And, as the next harvest proved very productive, they were enabled punctually to discharge all their obligations.

But now new troubles arose. The Chippeways, who had given the tract of land on which New Gnadenhuetten stood, claimed it back again, assigning as a reason, that by the erection of the settlement, they had lost one of their principal hunting districts. They even threatened to murder some of the inhabitants, and thus compelled the rest to quit the country. As it was not likely that these complaints and vexations would speedily terminate, the brethren resolved to seek for an eligible residence near the river Walhalding.

While preparing for their removal, they received intelligence that the congress of the United States, after the conclusion of the war with Great Britain, had given express orders that the territory on the Muskingum, formerly inhabited by the Christian Indians, should be reserved for them. This was welcome news at New Gnadenhuetten; for though an Indian feels a strong aversion to dwell in a place where any of his relatives have been killed, yet on embracing the gospel they have laid aside this superstitious notion. Various impediments, however, as yet prevented their return. The savages were still determined to carry on the war against the United States; and a great part of the Delawares and Shawanose declared their intention to oppose the return of the Christian Indians.

The brethren, however, resolved at all events to leave the banks of the Huron, and if they could not immediately remove to the Muskingum, to seek a temporary residence in some other convenient spot. The governor of fort Detroit approved of this determination. and sent formal messages to the Indians not to molest their Christian countrymen. By his kind interposition they received a compensation of two hundred dollars for their houses and plantations in New Gnadenhuetten, which were afterwards occupied by white settlers. He most generously offered them vessels to carry them across lake Erie to Cayahaga, and on their arrival supplied them with provisions.

In April 1786, the missionaries and their people left New Gnadenhuetten and went in twenty-two canoes to Detroit, the inhabitants of which expressed deep regret at their removal, having always found them industrious and honest neighbours. The governor treated them with great kindness and hospitality. In a few days they embarked in two trading vessels, the Beaver and Makina, belonging to the North-West Company, which one of the owners had kindly offered for the use of the congregation, and given strict orders to the captains to show them all possible kindness, and not run any risks in case of danger. Their voyage was pleasant and prosperous till they arrived at an island in the lake, where, owing to contrary winds, they were obliged to encamp for four weeks. At length a brisk gale sprung up, and in a short time brought them within sight of the Cayahaga coast. when the wind suddenly veered round and drove them back to their former anchorage.

In consequence of this long delay one of the vessels was ordered back to Detroit, and the captains agreed to land the congregation in two divisions at Sandusky, and then return with the vessels and bring the baggage to Cayahaga. The first division, being unable to reach Sandusky, disembarked at Rocky Point, about eighty miles distant from the bay. Their journey by land was very difficult, as it lay through a pathless desert. After some days the second division overtook them in slight canoes, hastily made of bark. They now travelled together; one party on foot along the border of lake Erie, the other in canoes, keeping close to the shore; and arrived in safety at Cayahaga on the 7th of June. Want of provisions made them hasten their departure, and proceed up the river till they came to an old town, formerly inhabited by Ottawas, about one hundred miles distant from Pittsburgh. Here they resolved to spend the summer; and, though the season was already far advanced, they still cleared the ground for planting, and even sowed some Indian corn. They called this place Pilgeruh.

The difficulties always attending the erection of a new settlement, were considerably lessened in this instance. For soon after their arrival they received a large supply of various necessary articles from the Brethren at Bethlehem, and some traders residing in the vicinity, readily furnished them with provisions, giving them credit for great part of the payment. The congress of the United States likewise ordered a quantity of Indian corn and blankets to be given them, and by a written message informed them that their return to the United States gave them great satisfaction, and they might always depend on the friendship and protection of government; promising to give them five hundred bushels of Indian corn, a hundred blankets and other necessaries from the public magazines, whenever they should remove to the Muskingum. This promise was scrupulously fulfilled, though their removal could not be immediately effected.

Pilgeruh was often visited by Chippeways, Ottawas and Delawares, expressing a desire to hear the gospel. But, while this circumstance afforded sincere pleasure to the missionaries, they met with troubles of a different kind from those to which they had been accustomed on the Huron. Several heathen Indians, who had relations in the settlement, endeavoured to seduce them to return to paganism, and on some their attempts were but two successful. Upon the whole, however, the state of things was pleasing, and warranted the hope, that, after a temporary rest in this place, they might proceed to the Muskingum.

The joy this prospect diffused through the congregation was soon interrupted. Various reports of new hostilities between the Americans and Indians reached Pilgeruh, and though they were soon discovered to be false, yet they excited no small consternation, as the recollection of the dreadful tragedy on the Muskingum was still too strong to be easily forgotten. Besides, the savages were as much against their remaining in their present situation as against their returning to their former settlements, and insisted on their removal to some other part of the country. This caused them much perplexity. After mature deliberation they determined to relinquish every idea of returning to the Muskingum at that time, and to seek for a peaceful and safe retreat on some convenient spot between Cayahaga and Pettquotting.

In April 1787 they broke up from Pilgeruh, and proceeding partly by land and partly by water, in less than a week arrived at the place they had fixed upon for their residence. This was very unlike any of their former places of abode. The soil was good and fertile, producing wild potatoes in great abundance; it appeared like a fruitful orchard, several apple and plum trees growing here and there; and the lake, which was only a league distant, abounded with fish. They therefore rejoiced at the thought of establishing a regular settlement in so pleasant a country, especially as it was not frequented by any of those savages who had hitherto proved such troublesome neighbours.

But their joy was of short duration. Not more than three or four days after their arrival, a Delaware captain came into the camp, and gave them positive orders to quit that place and remove to Sandusky, adding the most solemn promises of protection and safety, assuring them that the place appointed for their residence was not in the vicinity of the savages, the nearest Indian town being ten miles distant. Disagreeable as this message was, the missionaries considered submission as the path of duty. Nothing appeared so dreadful as the prospect of being again subject to a heathen government. Yet they could not deny that their calling seemed to require that they should live in the very midst of those heathen to whom they were to preach the gospel.

In the beginning of May they set forward, but had not proceeded far when they discovered that great part of the message was false, for the place intended for their residence was not above two miles from the villages of the heathen. They determined, therefore, to go no further, but settle near Pettquotting. Of this they informed the chiefs, and obtained their permission to stay at least a year in that place without molestation.

They fixed on a situation near a river called Huron, which empties itself into lake Erie at Pettquotting. On its western bank they laid out plantations, choosing the eastern, which was high land, for their dwellings; and called this settlement New Salem. Many heathen Indians attended their public worship; scarce a day passed without visits from strangers; and they had the satisfaction to find that the blessing of God accompanied their labours. Among those savages who at this time were converted from the error of their way, were two persons formerly noted for profligacy. The one had some years ago formed a plot against the lives of the missionaries, and had often lain in ambush to surprise them, but fortunately without success. Coming accidentally to Pilgeruh, the gospel made so deep and salutary an impression upon his mind that he cried day and night to the Lord to be delivered from the slavery of sin. The other was a Huron Indian, who declined the offer made him by his nation, to be their chief, and came to New Salem, declaring that he had been long seeking for something better than worldly honours. He intended to visit his heathen relations, but when hearing of Jesus and his love to sinners, he relinquished that design, and remained faithfully attached to the congregation, finding there among the believers, that peace and rest which he had so long sought in vain elsewhere.

Many of those Christian Indians also, who during the late troubles had been scattered through the country, successively returned to New Salem and were affectionately received. Yet with regard to such, as during their absence had relapsed into heathenism, proper discretion was used, and they were not admitted to the privileges of the church, till they had given satisfactory proofs of repentance and change of heart. The prosperity of the young people afforded the missionaries much pleasure. Many of them, by a strict conformity to the precepts of the gospel, showed that it had taken deep root in their understanding and affections. The assistants increased in grace and knowledge of the truth, and attended to their office with zeal and diligence. The good order maintained in the settlement, the peaceable conduct of its inhabitants, and their cheerful behaviour, excited the admiration of all who visited the place, not excepting the very savages themselves. One of their chiefs addressed the Christian Indians thus: "You are in truth a happy people, you live cheerfully and peaceably together; and this is to be found no where but among you."

Their residence near Pettquotting appeared very providential, as it afforded them an opportunity of becoming acquainted with many Indians. They had more visiters here than in any of their former places of abode, who were always treated with the kindest hospitality, though this was often attended with no small inconvenience and expense; for it was no uncommon case for one family to lodge and entertain ten or more persons for a whole week and even longer. The assistants displayed great zeal and activity in pointing out to their guests their need of a Saviour, and in commending the love of God in Christ Jesus; and their endeavours were not fruitless. Several heathen embraced the gospel and received holy baptism. Among these was Gelelemind, formerly a Delaware chief, and some other persons of distinction.

Gegeshumind, a son of the assistant Abraham, was another instance of the power of divine grace. Compelled by the pangs of a guilty conscience to disclose his true character, he freely acknowledged to brother Zeisberger, that he had been a notorious profligate: and, in order not to forget any of the evil deeds he had committed, he brought fifty-eight small pieces of wood with him, which were designed to remind him of the crimes of which he had been guilty. Deep-rooted superstition and long-contracted habits of vice drove him almost to despair, and for a time impeded his conversion; but the grace of God finally gained the victory, and liberated this slave of Satan. After his baptism he became a zealous confessor of the truth as it is in Jesus, especially when visiting the Indians. In this employment his knowledge of five of their languages, or dialects, was of great use to him.

Several apostates also returned, and some young men, acquainted with several languages, forsook paganism, joined the congregation, and became useful and active members of it, and the young people, born and educated in it, afforded the most pleasing hopes.

Those Christian Indians, who, after their dispersion from the Muskingum had retired to the Miami, continued to edify each other as well as circumstances would permit, and many of them remained true to their Christian profession. Some departed this life in peace and in assured hope of a better inheritance. The decrease in number, occasioned by their removal, was made up by others who found their way to New Salem. Among these was a girl, only eleven years old, who, as soon as she heard of the new settlement, undertook a journey of more than three hundred miles by herself, and arrived in safety. Thus the settlement was gradually increasing, and at the close of 1790 contained upwards of two hundred inhabitants.

After a tranquil residence of four years at New Salem they were obliged to quit that settlement. For some time past they had frequently been annoyed by the white dealers in rum, residing in their neighbourhood, and now they were alarmed by reports of hostilities having commenced between the United States and the Indians. They therefore endeavoured to find a temporary asylum in the English territory. For this purpose they fixed on a place lying about eighteen miles from Detroit. The governor of that town kindly afforded them every assistance in his power. The whole congregation, upwards of two hundred in number, crossed lake Erie in thirty canoes, and reached their new residence on the 4th of May, 1791, the missionaries and the heavy baggage being conveyed in a vessel, hired by a gentleman in Detroit for that purpose.*

Among other heathen, who, during their abode in this place, sought the fellowship of the Christian Indians, was a man of the tribe of the Wiondats. For some years he had manifested an inclination to live with them, and labouring now under a serious illness, he renewed his application. Some Indian brethren visited him and spent nearly the whole night in conversing with him on the love of Jesus to sinners. This greatly enlivened him, and he regretted that he was not able to go with them, declaring that he wished to die among them. In a day or two he was brought to the settlement. The Roman Catholic priest, in whose communion he had been baptized, asking him why he had changed his religion, he replied: "I have been long among you, and repeatedly heard your discourses, but it was all hay and stubble, and I have found nothing among you that could tranquilize my mind; but among these believing Indians I have found peace."

Their stay in this place did not last above a year. Some of their white neighbours, not being amicably disposed toward the mission, molested them in various ways; and war having now broken out between the Americans and savages, the latter sent repeated messages to the Christian Indians to take up the hatchet against the white people, and, in case of refusal, threatened to treat them as they had done their brethren on the Muskingum, or force them to return to paganism. Besides this, their present residence, from its low situation, was very unhealthy; many of the Indians died, and the missionaries themselves were frequently indisposed.

No other resource being left them than to abandon their present place of abode, they directed their thoughts to Upper Canada, where the English government had assigned, for the use of the mission, twenty-five thousand acres of land, lying on the river Retrench, or Thames, which falls into the east side of lake St. Clair. In April, 1792, the whole congregation moved thither, going partly by land and partly by water. Having fixed on a proper spot, they immediately began to build and divide the land into farms. The district allotted to them consisted of three large dales; the high grounds being sandy, but the low lands uncommonly fertile and well watered. Their greatest difficulty was, that they were obliged to fetch all the stones, required for building, from the bed of the river. To this settlement they gave the name of Fairfield. It was afterwards declared to be a regular township, containing twelve miles in length and six in breadth: and the inhabitants in a short time improved it so much, that the wilderness was literally changed into a fruitful field.

In a few years Fairfield became a very flourishing settlement. In 1797 it contained fifty houses, some of them large and convenient, inhabited by about one hundred and fifty Indians, besides the missionaries. By their industry in agriculture and various manufactures, the inhabitants could not only supply their own immediate necessities, but advantageously dispose of many articles to their neighbours. On an average they annually furnished the North-west Fur-company with two thousand bushels of Indian corn. In winter they made about five thousand pounds of maple-sugar; and though they consumed a great part of it themselves, yet what they brought to market was still considerable, and of superior quality to any manufactured in Canada. They also raised a great number of cattle for sale; for, being accustomed to deer's flesh, beef is unpalatable to Indians, and they, therefore, seldom eat it. Their canoes, coopery, baskets, mats, &c. also commanded a ready sale. The whole country was benefitted by their industry, as it served to reduce the price of many of the principal necessaries of life.

The establishment of the Brethren here was of public utility in another point of view. When they first came to these parts, the nearest settlers to them resided at a distance of thirty leagues; but no sooner was it known that the Christian Indians would form a colony on this river, than the adjacent lands were eagerly taken by white people; and in a few years above a hundred families established themselves in their neighbourhood. Having themselves opened roads in various directions through the country, travellers were continually passing to and fro, both by land and water, and hence Fairfield might be considered as lying on the great road to Niagara. Thus this settlement appeared to be admirably suited for a missionary station, from whence the gospel might be proclaimed to the different and numerous tribes of the Chippeways.

Soon after their arrival at Fairfield the Indians in the vicinity frequently visited them and attended their worship, especially the Monsys, who had a village at no great distance; and the native assistants from Fairfield, in their turn, visited them, embracing every opportunity for preaching the gospel. In a few instances it displayed its converting power; but most of the inhabitants, not only rejected it themselves, but opposed those who were inclined to receive it. The relatives of a certain woman endeavoured to deter her from going to reside with the believers, intimating that these Christian Indians and their teachers would meet a similar fate with their predecessors on the Muskingum. But nothing could shake her resolution, and the only reply she made was: "Should the believers suffer evil, as you say, I will share it with them; and if it goes well with them, I also shall enjoy it; where they dwell, there I will likewise dwell." The firmness of another Indian woman was not less remarkable. She was not moved from the purpose of joining the believers, either by the loss of her property, which was mostly taken from her, or by the terrifying predictions of the sorcerers, who prophesied she would not live long if she went to the Christians.

The most numerous tribe of Indians, occupying the territory in which Fairfield lies, were the Chippeways. Many of these visited the settlement, and frequently with much apparent devotion attended divine worship. This was particularly the case in 1791, when a party of warriors, belonging to this tribe, encamped near the settlement, and remained there the whole winter. An old man from the camp actually took up his abode in Fairfield, and the missionaries entertained good hopes respecting him; but in a few months, under pretence of fetching his children, he went away and never returned.

* This place, being only a temporary residence, received no particular name.

As the war between the United States and the Indians still continued, our brethren were often annoyed by companies of warriors passing through Fairfield, or encamping near the place, and sending repeated messages to the Christian Indians, challenging them to join in the contest. In these cases the missionaries found it the most advisable to let their converts act according to their own insight and disposition, only exhorting them to put their trust in God, and not be intimidated by the threats of men. The consequence was, that, with the exception of only very few of the less stable members of the congregation, who joined the warriors, they declined all their challenges with firmness.

Notwithstanding these temptations, the internal course of the congregation was pleasing and prosperous. The edifying deaths of some members of it, excited the survivors to give increasing diligence to make their calling and election sure. Among those who about this time finished their mortal race, were two aged men, David and Joachim, who for many years had been intimate friends, and latterly, being too feeble to work, used to spend many hours together, discoursing of the salvation of their souls, the love and mercy of God our Saviour, the hope of eternal life, &c. David, who departed in 1797, had been baptized at Gnadenhuetten, on the Mahony, in 1753, and remained steadfast to his profession amidst all the vicissitudes which in the sequel befel the Christian Indians. In 1782, when the missionaries were separated from their flock and carried to Detroit, he retired to the river Thames, and lived like a hermit, near the spot where Fairfield was afterwards built. He therefore rejoiced greatly when this settlement was formed, and in it spent the remainder of his days, being universally respected and beloved.

His friend, Joachim, was the first Delaware who embraced the gospel. After his baptism in 1715 he resided a whole year in the house of the single brethren at Bethlehem, and ever after spoke of this period with much pleasure. In the sequel he bore all the sufferings, with which the Indian congregation was visited, with unshaken confidence in our Saviour. After their dispersion at Sandusky he lived for some time by himself, and never mixed with the heathen. As soon as the congregation was again collected near Pettquotting he joined it, and led a very exemplary life to his end. He understood the German and English languages, could read a little, and was one of the best interpreters of the sermons delivered by the missionaries.

The necessity of watching over their flock and guarding it against relapsing into heathenism and its sinful and abominable practices, was a duty which, however painful, was never neglected by the missionaries. In general they left the preservation of good order and regularity in the settlement to the assistants, that they might attend with less distraction to their more important functions and "give themselves continually unto prayer and the ministry of the Word." And in this respect the services of the assistants were generally effective. In extraordinary cases, however, and when public offence was given, the missionaries interfered, and enforced discipline according to plain scripture rule without respect of persons. A distressing instance of this kind occurred in 1797, but which, by the grace of God, terminated in the sincere repentance of the offenders. Several members of the congregation having been guilty of intemperance, and the assistants, having not only connived at it, but in other respects been remiss in the performance of their duty, the missionaries first called them together, representing to them the unchristian and offensive nature of their conduct, whereby they had disqualified themselves from holding any office in the church, until they manifested real repentance. They then exhorted them to confess their transgressions to our Saviour, and seek his pardon, and likewise to humble themselves before their brothers and sisters, asking their forgiveness, hoping that their example might be imitated by the other offenders. A few days after brother Zeisberger presented the offenders before the whole congregation (which had been convened for that purpose), admonishing them to sincere repentance. These admonitions had the desired effect. The guilty humbly acknowledge their transgressions, and spent several days in meeting together in small parties, and confessing to each other their deviations, with tears asking the forgiveness of all whom they had offended. The missionaries gratefully acknowledged the hand of the Lord in thus leading the transgressors to true compunction of heart for their misconduct. The end of discipline having thus been fully attained, they once more called the congregation together, and brother Zeisberger addressed them from Rev. ii. 5. "Remember from whence thou art fallen, and repent and do thy first works." After fervent prayer, during which the whole assembly burst into loud weeping, he dismissed them in peace.

The missionaries were not inattentive to the spiritual wants of their white neighbours. Many of them regularly attended divine service at Fairfield, and brought their children thither to be baptized. Those, who lived at a greater distance, invited the missionaries to preach in their villages. In general they were treated with great respect by the settlers, who reposed almost unlimited confidence in them. The inhabitants of a certain town were even desirous of electing brother Senseman their representative in the assembly of the state. An honour which he declined, as being incompatible with his missionary calling.

No very striking success attended their endeavours for the conversion of the heathen Indians. For though many visited the settlement, the salutary impressions made on their minds by the preaching of the gospel, were but too successfully effaced by the temptation of white dealers, who were continually seducing them to drunkenness; and thus neglect of the interests of their souls, and the commission of many crimes followed of course. During the six years, since their removal from Pettquotting, only twelve adult Indians and forty children had been baptized. But amidst all these discouragements the missionaries did not relax in the zealous prosecution of their calling, and they had the joy to observe, that those Christian Indians, who lived with them, with few exceptions, walked in the fear of the Lord, building up each other in their most holy faith. With regard to such characters as appeared still undecided, or had suffered themselves to be seduced by others, they exercised all possible patience, and admonished them in love; for they had learned by the experience of many years, that as their notions of liberty are unbounded, nothing is effected with Indians by force or constraint. Some of those who had strayed at the time of the massacre on the Muskingum, and had till now remained among the pagans, returned and sought leave to reside in the settlement.

Peace having been restored between the Indians and the United States, a resolution was formed, to renew the mission on the Muskingum, where congress had formerly granted to the Brethren's Society (in America) for propagating the gospel among the heathen, the land on which Gnadenhuetten, Schoenbrunn and Salem formerly stood, with four thousand acres of ground adjoining to each of the settlements. In this view the brethren J. Heckewaelder and William Henry, in the summer of 1797, went to take a survey of it. They found the whole district overgrown with an impervious thicket of briers and brushwood of various kinds, the haunt of serpents, bears, deer, turkies and other animals. Some ruins of the houses were still standing, and the place where the Indians were massacred, was strongly marked, many of their bones lying concealed under the ashes.

In August, the following year, several Indian families from Fairfield, consisting of thirty-three persons, commenced the renewal of the mission there. The venerable David Zeisberger, with truly apostolical zeal, though then seventy-seven years old, volunteered his services for this difficult and arduous undertaking, being accompanied by his wife, likewise aged and infirm, and the missionary Benjamin Mortimer. The journey, as usual in this country, was tedious, occupying nearly two months, and was attended with many dangers and difficulties both by land and water. When they came to the carrying-place in the river Cayahaga, they were obliged to drag the loaded canoes for seven miles over solid rocks; but by great exertions they reached the place of their destination in October, in good health and perfect safety. The Indians indeed combated every hardship with wonderful composure and steady perseverance. They never murmured, and not an individual among them ever appeared to lament having undertaken the journey, or to flinch from the duties he had thereby imposed on himself. It is justly remarked by the missionaries, "that men of their stamp and character, if properly prepared for the work by the Spirit of God, would be the fittest of all others to make known the gospel to their wild countrymen living at a distance." It was strongly impressed on their own minds, that they had undertaken the journey for that very purpose, and most of them expressed an ardent desire to be useful to their heathen countrymen by leading them to a knowledge of the Saviour of sinners. They entered into an agreement among themselves, to renew the ancient hospitality and treat all visiters in the most friendly manner.

Thus after the lapse of more than seventeen years, since the Christian Indians were forcibly expelled from this part of the country, a few of the survivors, in reliance on the help of God, ventured to re-occupy that station. They erected their first settlement near the former site of Schoenbrunn, and called it Goshen. A few heathen families in the sequel moved thither and embraced the gospel. At the beginning of the year 1801, the number of inhabitants amounted to seventy-one persons. The love and Christian simplicity prevailing among them, were noticed by all visiters with great pleasure and much edification. Their number, however, was considerably diminished the following year, as several families removed to the river Wabash, to commence a mission among the Indians there.

November the 17th, 1808, the venerable brother David Zeisberger finished his earthly pilgrimage, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. Of this long life he had spent above sixty years as a missionary among the Indians, suffering numberless hardships and privations, and enduring many dangers. He had acquired an extensive knowledge of the Delaware language and several other Indian tongues. But most of his translations, vocabularies and other books for the instruction of the Indians, being only in manuscript, were burned on the Muskingum; and the unsettled state of the mission for a long period after, his other multifarious avocations, and his advancing age, did not allow him sufficient leisure or strength completely to make up this loss. His zeal for the conversion of the heathen never abated, and no consideration could prevail on him to leave his beloved Indian flock. The younger missionaries revered him as a father, and before they entered upon their labours, generally spent some time at Goshen, to profit by his counsel and instruction. Within a few months of his death he became nearly blind, yet, being perfectly resigned to the will of God, he did not lose his usual cheerfulness; and though his body was almost worn to a skeleton, his judgment remained unimpaired. Thus "as a shock of corn cometh in its season, so he came to the grave in a full age, and entered into the joy of his Lord."*

The surviving missionaries continued their labours in Goshen and enjoyed peace and quietness, and even during the war in 1813, when Fairfield was destroyed, they experienced no serious molestation or interruption. The vicinity of the two colonies of Bersaba and Gnadenhuetten, inhabited by English and Germans, who are members of the Brethren's church, likewise profited by the visits and services of the missionaries. Hereby a constant friendly intercourse was maintained between these two colonies and the missionary settlement. The missionaries occasionally made itinerant tours through the country, in order to visit those Indians who formerly belonged to the congregation at Pettquotting, and now were scattered in the wilderness like sheep without a shepherd, and to preach the gospel to the heathen. On these circuits they often, and mostly on foot, travelled three-hundred miles.

The Indians belonging to this congregation, though but few in number, walked consistently with their Christian profession, which the more strongly excited the gratitude of their teachers, as they were daily exposed to the most alluring temptations. Within the distance of only three miles from them, lay a town, a very Sodom, on account of the wickedness of its inhabitants, who, though they were white people, and called themselves Christians, lived in the practice of every abomination, and tried every base art to seduce the believing Indians. Hitherto, however, even the weakest among them continued to show too much reverence for the Word of God, to yield to these temptations; and the missionaries observed also among the young people encouraging evidences, that they were often powerfully impressed with divine truth, and showed an abhorrence of paganism and its concomitant vices and misery. Yet the ungodly lives of the white settlers had an injurious tendency in keeping the savages from attending the ministrations of the gospel; consequently few conversions from heathenism occurred at Goshen. An Indian-girl was baptized on the 6th of January 1817. Brother Luckenbach paid particular attention to the school, and several of the children showed a good capacity, and were able to read the English Testament. Among other exercises they translated portions of Scripture into their own language, which gave the missionaries an opportunity of knowing, whether they understood what they read. The number of inhabitants at Goshen did not exceed fifty.

As early as the year 1740 attempts were made by the Brethren to propagate the gospel among the Cherokees, but these and several succeeding endeavours were frustrated by repeated wars among the different Indian tribes, as well as by subsequent hostilities between the English and Americans. Nothing, therefore, was effected by the journeys made by them into this territory, except forming a friendly intercourse with that nation. In 1799 the Brethren's Society (in North America) for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, received intelligence that the Cherokees wished to have teachers residing among them. Whereupon the brethren Abraham Steiner and F. C. von Schweinitz were commissioned to visit that part of the country and inquire into the disposition of its Indian inhabitants. But the season being already far advanced, the object of their journey was not fully attained. Meanwhile a correspondence was kept up with some gentlemen, who favoured the undertaking, and resided in those parts. By their advice the two brethren left Salem in North Carolina towards the end of August following, to pay a second visit in that district. In about three weeks they arrived at Tellico on the river Tennessee, being the frontier-town of the United States towards the territory of the Cherokees. Some days after the chiefs of the two tribes, the Upper and Lower Cherokees, assembled to hold a great council, at which between three and four thousand Indians were present. To this assembly our brethren were introduced and laid before it the object of their journey. After spending several days in consultation, all the Upper chiefs declared their approbation of the proposal; but the Lower chiefs would not agree to it, and appeared rather indifferent.

* David Zeisberger was the son of one of those Moravian emigrants, who laid the foundation of the renewed Brethren's church. He came to America when still a youth, and resided some time in Georgia, and afterwards at Bethlehem. Ever since the year 1746 he has been engaged in the mission among the North American Indians.

Having once devoted himself to this service, from the most voluntary choice and the purest motives, he steadily pursued his object, to wit, the glory of God in the salvation of his fellow-men. Never was he so happy as when he had ground for believing that his endeavours had been the means of converting one sinner from the error of his ways, and leading him to the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord. This, in his estimation, was of far higher value, than if he had acquired possession of the whole world. It may be said with truth, that he watched over his Indian flock with the solicitude of a parent, and cherished them as a nurse doth her children. He followed them in all their wanderings, cheerfully bearing with them the heat and burden of the day, and during the last forty years of his life he was never, at any one time, six months absent from his charge.

He was blessed with a cool, active, and intrepid spirit, unappalled by danger, and with a sound judgment, and clear discernment. He was therefore seldom taken by surprise, and was generally prepared to meet and overcome difficulties. If once convinced, that he was in the path of duty, he patiently submitted to every hardship, and, with firm fortitude, endured the severest sufferings. In the course of a long life, spent among savages, he was exposed to many privations, and at times suffered persecution from the enemies of divine truth, who more than once sought his life. But none of these things dismayed him; they rather increased his zeal in the Lord's cause, and in more instances than one has he had the pleasure of baptizing Indians, who not long before had lifted up the hatchet to murder him. At the same time he was of an humble and meek spirit, and always thought lowly of himself. He was a most affectionate husband; a faithful and never failing friend; and every lineament of his character showed a sincere, upright, benevolent, and generous soul, with perhaps as few blemishes as can be expected in the best of men on this side the grave.

In the evening of his days, when his faculties began to fail him, his desire to depart and be with Christ increased. At the same time he awaited his dissolution with uniform, calm, and dignified resignation to the will of his Maker, and in the sure and certain hope of exchanging this world for a better. His last words were, "Lord Jesus, I pray thee, come and take my spirit to thyself." And again, "Thou hast never yet forsaken me in any trial, thou will not forsake me now."—A very respectable company attended his funeral. The solemn service was performed in the English, the Delaware, and German languages, to suit the different auditors. Two sermons were preached from Rev. xii. 11, and Prov. x. 7.

Zeisberger was a man of low stature, yet well proportioned, of a cheerful countenance, and endowed with a good understanding. He was a friend and benefactor to mankind, and justly beloved by all who knew him, and who could appreciate genuine worth. His words were few, and never known to be wasted at random, or in an unprofitable manner. Plain in his habits, temperate in all things, and blessed with a sound constitution, he generally enjoyed good health, and lived to a far advanced age.

He made himself complete master of two of the Indian languages, the Onondago and the Delaware, and acquired some knowledge of several others. Of the Onondago he composed two Grammars, one written in English, and the other in German. He likewise compiled a Dictionary of the Delaware language, which in the manuscript contained seventeen hundred pages. Nearly the whole of these manuscripts was lost at the burning of the settlements on the Muskingum. A Spelling-book in the same language has passed through two editions. A volume of Sermons to Children, and a Hymn-book containing upwards of five hundred hymns, chiefly translations from the English and German Hymn-books in use in the Brethren's Church, have also been published in the Delaware (or Lenape) language. He left behind him, in manuscript, a Grammar of the Delaware, written in German, and a translation into the same language of Lieberkuehns' Harmony of the Four Gospels. The former of these works has since been translated into English, for the American Philosophical Society, by P. S. Du Ponceau of Philadelphia; and the Female Auxillary Missionary Society of Bethlehem has undergone the publication of the Harmony.

Every thing having been finally determined upon by the directors of the missions, and the needful permission obtained from the government, the brethren A. Steiner and Gottlieb Byhan went thither in April 1801, and took up their abode with a Mr. Vann, who treated them with great kindness, and sent his Negroes to assist in building a cottage on the land appropriated for the use of the mission, subsequently called Spring-place. Mr. Vann's friendship was of essential service to them, for as the Indians generally respected him, and the worst stood in awe of him, none ventured to molest them. They preached every Sunday at his house to whites, Negroes and half-Indians. Some of the latter attended very regularly. They could as yet converse but little with the Cherokees, the acquisition of their language being a very arduous task, especially as they found it difficult to procure a good interpreter.

On their arrival in the country the Indians gave them a very cordial reception, and expressed great satisfaction at their coming; but when the missionaries found it impracticable directly to open a school for their children, the great council at Esternally came to a resolution to order them to quit the country, alleging as a reason for this unexpected resolution, that the missionaries had not kept their promise, no school having yet been begun. But as the chiefs allowed them half a year for deliberating on this business, every thing was amicably adjusted and arranged to the satisfaction of both parties.

The necessary buildings at Spring-place being completed, they commenced their school with four Indian boys, whom they lodged, boarded and instructed. Their number was gradually increased, and as our missionaries had not room to accommodate them all, Mr. Vann kindly took some into his own house. Several of them were sons of chiefs, who appeared very desirous that their children should be instructed. The young people rewarded the labours of their teachers by making a good progress in reading (both English and Cherokees), writing and arithmetic, and by the pleasore they took in learning hymns and texts of Scripture. They frequently seemed much impressed when the missionaries spoke to them of the love of God in Christ Jesus. After leaving the school they kept up an epistolary correspondence with their former teachers, adverting with delight to their residence at Spring-place. The endeavours of the brethren were greatly facilitated by the kind exertions of the agent for the Cherokee nation, colonel Meig, who procured them some assistance for their school from government.

With regard to the principal aim of their residence in this country, they as yet reaped little fruit from their labours. The good disposition of the Cherokees towards them did indeed not abate, but the work of conversion proceeded very slowly. The public preaching, however, was sometimes attended by thirty or forty, and those Indians who occasionally visited them, appeared in some degree convinced of the importance of the gospel. Their worship was also frequently attended by Negroes, many of whom are kept by the white settlers in these parts, instead of servants. Towards the close of 1811 they had the pleasure to see three half-Indians commemorate with them the death of the Lord at his table. One of their former scholars, Dazizi, had settled in their immediate neighbourhood, and seemed truly concerned for his salvation. He faithfully assisted them in their domestic affairs. With respect to some others of their scholars, the prospect was encouraging.

In externals God blessed the labour of their hands; they introduced several useful trades, cultivated the land with advantage, improved their habitations, and Spring-place was considered one of the healthiest missionary stations in North America.

About a year after the mission to the Cherokees had been begun, a formal message was sent by the chiefs and great council of the Delawares on the river Woapikamikunk, a branch of the Wabash, to the brethren at Goshen, requesting that some teachers might be sent to them. Considering this as a new door opened for the diffusion of the gospel, the Christian Indians at Goshen, in return, sent a solemn message to those on the Wabash, informing them that several families of their believing countrymen, with some missionaries, would come and instruct them in the Word of God.

Pursuant to this proposal, the brethen Kluge and Luckenbach, and twelve Christian Indians, (including three children,) left Goshen towards the end of February, 1801, and in a few weeks arrived in safety on the Woapikamikunk, and were received by the people there with every token of pleasure and friendship. They chose an elevated spot for their dwelling, situated between nine populous Indian towns, inhabited by different tribes. Several Indians, formerly baptized by the Brethren, had settled here after the general dispersion of the congregation at the close of the American war. These, having hitherto been forcibly prevented by their pagan relatives from returning to their teachers, the missionaries hoped to collect together again.

They had not been long in this quarter before a few heathen came to reside with them, and were baptized. The preaching of the gospel was frequently attended by a considerable number of serious hearers, and the chiefs treated them with respect and apparent friendship. Their settlement also was improved: at the end of the year 1802 it consisted of ten houses besides the chapel, and contained twenty-three inhabitants. But this quiet and comparative prosperity were soon interrupted. For some time past they had resolved to change their present place of abode; but, as their endeavours to find a convenient spot had not succeeded, they deferred their removal, till danger, which they considered still distant, at once burst upon them, attended with all the horrors which on former occasions but too awfully distinguished the ruthless attacks of the savages on their innocent Christian countrymen.

In the autumn of 1805, one of the chiefs, who had been their friend and protector, died; and another, who likewise respected and befriended them, was deposed. The savages now became ungovernable, threatened to murder the missionaries, and even killed their cattle before their eyes. This, however, was only the prelude to a transaction as atrocious as any that ever disgraced human nature; as will appear by the following extract from the journal of the missionaries:

"In February, 1806, all the Indians in this district were summoned by their teachers, or lying prophets, to assemble on the Woapikamikunk, to hear the foolish stories fabricated by the emissaries of Satan, of pretended visions and revelations received from God, and to be instructed how to act in conformity to them. Among these teachers was a Shawanose, an arch imposter. Pretending that he was able to know and discover hidden mysteries, his deluded countrymen submitted to him with profound respect. The Delaware tribo received him with great cordiality, and resolved to hold a grand council, in order to root out all witchcraft and poison-mixing, (which, according to their superstitious notions, existed among them,) and by fire to extort confession from all such as this imposter should accuse; and whoever would not confess, should be hewn in pieces with their war-hatchets, and burned. With a view to execute their horrid purpose, the young Indians got together, chose the more ferocious to be their leaders, deposed all the old chiefs, and guarded the whole Indian assembly, especially the aged of both sexes, as if they were prisoners of war. The venerable old chief Tettepachsit was the first whom they accused of possessing poison, and of having destroyed many Indians by his art. When the poor old man would not confess, they fastened him with cords to two posts, and began to roast him at a slow fire. During the torture, he said that he kept poison in the house of our Indian brother Joshua. Nothing was more welcome to the savages than this accusation, for they wished to deprive us of the assistance of this man, who was the only Christian Indian residing with us at that time. They had frequently sent him invitations to attend their heathenish festivities, but he would never accept them. His answer was: 'You know that I am a believer in the true God, whose Word we made known to you; I therefore can have no fellowship with you in your wicked works. Do you as you please, but leave me to serve the living God.' This answer displeased them much, and on March 13th, they sent seven wild Indians, with painted faces, to our settlements, and took him away by main force. They pretended that he only need tell Tettepachsit to his face that he had no poison in his house, and he might then return home. All excuses were vain, and Joshua was compelled to accompany them to the assembly at Woapikamikunk.

"When he was presented to Tettepachsit, he frankly confessed that he had accused him merely to pacify the enraged multitude, and escape from the torture. Joshua was now pronounced not guilty, yet they would not permit him to return; but insisted on his remaining with them till the Shawanose imposter should arrive. This son of Belial arriving the same day, all the Indians of both sexes were ordered by him to sit down in a large circle, when he would declare who had poison in his possession. The two old chiefs, Tettepachsit and Hackinpomska, were both accused of poison-mixing; and the former was more particularly charged with the untimely death of many Indians. When the Shawanose was asked about Joshua, he indeed declared that he had no poison, but that he was possessed of an evil spirit, by which he was able to destroy other Indians. Pleased with this verdict, they seized these three poor innocent men, and strictly watched them as condemned criminals. We knew nothing of these horrible events until the evening of the 16th, when a message was brought that the savages had burned an old woman, who at a former period had been baptized by the Brethren, and also that our poor Joshua was kept close prisoner.

"On the 17th our distress and fear concerning the fate of Joshua rose still higher. We were stunned with horror on seeing ten of the most savage Indians, with blackened faces, conducting Tettepachsit, arrive in our settlement. Soon after, these murderous wretches kindled a large fire close to our place; and, having given the aged chief a blow on the head with a war-hatchet, threw him alive into the flames, diverting themselves with the miserable cries and convulsions of the poor dying man. The flames communicated to the grass and wood near the settlement, by which all our dwellings were filled with smoke.

"After committing this horrid murder, the savages came boldly into our house, boasting of their atrocious deed; and, assuming a hypocritical mein, demanded bread and tobacco, which we were obliged to give them. We took courage to ask them what would be the fate of Joshua. They immediately began to accuse him, saying there was good reason for detaining him a prisoner, for they knew well that he understood the black-art, and could destroy the Indians, his faith in our doctrines being a mere pretence. In vain we endeavoured to convince them of the untruth of these assertions. They pretended to set our minds at ease, by saying that they would not kill him. We charged them to tell their captains, that they ought well to consider what they were doing; that Joshua had long been a believer, and had never had any concern with the things of which they accused him, for he was a servant of God, and had renounced the devil and all his works; and that he was of the Mahikan tribe, and not a Delaware, and had accompanied us as interpreter. We therefore requested that they would immediately release him, for we should consider all they did unto him as done unto ourselves, &c. But they manifested the most diabolical hypocrisy; for, though they knew that Joshua was to be murdered that very day, they promised to deliver our words to the captains. We easily perceived that our defence of Joshua had displeased them; and they left our place in a riotous manner.

"Though we had been informed that the savages suspected us of keeping poison, for the purpose of making those Indians sick who would not do as we directed them; and though we did not know to what length the devil might instigate them to carry their fury, nor what our fate might be, yet we felt ourselves constrained to go to their assembly, and try what we could do for the preservation of Joshua, or at least to give him comfort and advice, should we even suffer for it. But as my wife and children (writes brother Kluge) could not be left alone in so dreadful a situation, brother Luckenbach took courage to go alone.

"He had hardly proceeded half way before he met an Indian, who informed him that Joshua had become a victim to their cruelty on the foregoing day. They had given him two cuts in his head with a hatchet, and then thrown him into the fire. With these dreadful tidings brother Luckenbach returned to us in the afternoon. This was the heaviest stroke we had yet met with. Dread and terror took from us all power of speech and reflection, and we could do nothing but utter cries of lamentation and woe.

"Having, in some degree, recovered ourselves, our first thought was to sell all our goods, and fly as expeditiously as possible towards Goshen. During our preparations for the journey, a sudden change of the weather to severe cold prevented us from departing so soon as we intended.

"Some days after we were informed that Joshua had spoken a great deal at the place where he was murdered, in a language not understood by the Indians; which led us to suppose that he had directed his prayers to the Lord in German, which he spoke well. When the savages forced him from us, he was in a very comfortable state of mind, and seemed well prepared to leave the world, and as a reconciled sinner to meet his Saviour. In the following days more Indians were accused, and shared the same fate."*

Not long after this tragical event, the missionaries were forced altogether to relinquish the station on the Wabash.

When the Brethren erected the settlement of Fairfield in Canada, they were peculiarly pleased with the facility which its local situation promised for extending their missionary labours to the Chippeway Indians, who inhabited several towns only a short distance from its seite. In order to carry this benevolent design into effect, the missionary C. F. Dencke, who possessed the happy talent of acquiring a new language with ease, and was already well versed in the Delaware tongue, paid several visits to the Chippeways in 1801, and the following year took up his abode among them on a piece of ground formally allotted to him by the chiefs. Its situation was very convenient, lying on the river Ionquakamik, and being surrounded by eight Indian villages.

Here he lived for a time almost separated from society; for, excepting some Indian hunting huts, the nearest human habitation to him was Mr. Harsen's dwelling, about a mile distant, on the opposite side of the river. In a little while, however, two or three Indian families put up their tents near his house; and he was frequently visited by others, some of whom occasionally lodged with him for a night. He omitted no opportunity of commending to them the gospel of salvation; and in some instances his words appeared to gain entrance into their hearts, for they repeated their visits, and declared that they could not forget his conversation, saying, "It had made them sick at heart." Being obliged to give up a school which he had commenced with Mr. Harsen's boys, as the mother found it inconvenient to send them, he applied himself with the greater diligence to learn the Chippeway dialect, and translated several portions of the Bible. These he read to the Indians who visited him; and they all declared that they understood them very well.

In the sequel, however, the savages began to express dissatisfaction at his residence among them, fostering a suspicion that he had come to possess himself of their country. Some even uttered threats against his life, and he was finally obliged to abandon his station and return to Fairfield.

Not discouraged by these repeated failures, the Brethren in North America persevered in their philanthropic endeavours to convey the blessings of Christianity to the heathen nations around them. During a visitation, held by bishop Loskiel at Goshen in the year 1803, it was resolved to begin a new settlement at Pettquotting, on lake Erie. Agreeably to this resolution, the missionaries Haven and Oppelt, together with thirty-six Indian brethren and sisters from Fairfield, moved thither in spring, 1804, and formed a colony about three miles beyond the towns belonging to the Monsys. At the end of the year this small congregation consisted of sixty-seven persons. Amidst various hardships, the courage of the missionaries was strengthened by the experience of the Lord's gracious help, and by clear evidences of the work of his holy Spirit on the hearts of the Indian brethren and sisters. Their worship was sometimes attended by a considerable number of heathen, though as yet apparently without any salutary effect.

A few years after their arrival they found it would be necessary for them to quit this place, being informed that government had sold this district to some white settlers, which exposed them to the danger of being driven away at a short warning. Besides this, the proximity of the Monsy towns and the introduction of the rum-trade, which the missionaries could not prevent, were circumstances very pernicious to the morals of their young people. They, therefore, deemed it expedient to emigrate from Pettquotting, and took up their residence on Sandusky creek. On its western bank they erected a temporary building on a piece of ground allotted to them by the Monsy tribe. The missionaries Luckenbach and Hagen visited two Monsy towns, lying higher up the river, generally twice a week, and preached as often as circumstances would permit. They were likewise invited by the chief of the Wyondats to come to upper Sandusky. Most of those Indians residing in these parts who had been baptized in former years, regularly attended divine worship, bringing their children with them. But, though they often seemed much impressed with the truths of the gospel, no material change was wrought on their conduct, as they too easily yielded to the solicitations of the heathen to attend their idolatrous festivities. Very few of the latter ever attended their meetings; and only ten Indian children, most of whom had been formerly baptized, came to the school.

In the year 1812, the Monsy tribe, with a view to whose instruction the missionaries resided in that country, very unexpectedly resolved to leave the banks of the Sandusky and form a settlement on the Huron, in the province of Michigan. Forty families consequently emigrated, and among them were all those formerly baptized by the Brethren; some of whom intended to go to Fairfield, if they could obtain permission to pass over to the English territory. After their departure, the missionaries deemed it expedient to forsake their present residence, and occupy a house formerly built by a Presbyterian minister for a school; and which, being unoccupied at the time, was offered them. They were induced to accept this offer, in the hope that they might from thence visit the Wyondats and Mingoes, and diffuse the knowledge of the gospel among them. This station, however, was afterwards abandoned.

In the year 1803, the Brethren's Society (in North America) for Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, directed their attention to the Creek Indians, a very populous nation, computed at seventy or eighty thousand souls; and among whom, through the laudable exertions of the government of the United States, a greater degree of improvement and civilization had been introduced than was to be met with among the other native tribes. In order to carry their design into effect, they first deputed brother A. Steiner, on his return from Springplace, to make a journey into the country of the Creeks. This commission he executed towards the end of the summer in the above-mentioned year. He proceeded to Fort Wilkinson, on the river Oconu, in Georgia, and was treated with great kindness and hospitality by Colonel Hawkins, at whose house he lodged during his stay of seven days. The colonel entered warmly into the proposal for establishing a mission in this part of the country, pointing out the mode most likely to be attended with success; and promising to aid the undertaking in every possible way, by his friendship, advice and protection.

Animated by these encouraging prospects, two missionaries went to this country and occupied a house kindly provided for them by Colonel Hawkins, situate on the river Flint, about sixty miles from Milledgeville, the seat of government in Georgia. Here they diligently applied themselves to the study of the language, and visited the Indians in their own villages. The latter also frequently came to them, chiefly indeed for the purpose of purchasing their manufactured goods, for as yet they evinced but little disposition to hear and believe the gospel. The unsettled state of the country, during the ensuing war, rendered it necessary to abandon this station.

In detailing these minor attempts of the Brethren to propagate the gospel among the Indians, it appeared the most convenient not to interrupt the relation by too nice a regard to the order of time; a reference is therefore made to them all here, as they respectively succeeded each other. We shall now resume the thread of the general narrative.

After the emigration of several families from Fairfield in 1798, for the purpose of commencing the mission at Goshen, the former settlement, though considerably diminished in point of numbers, continued in a flourishing state, both as to its temporal prosperity and the progressive advance of the major part of its inhabitants in those pious and moral habits which adorn the character of the true Christian. Perplexities and trials of various kinds were indeed not wanting: but their greatest trouble arose from the white people in their vicinity, who, by the introduction of the rum-trade, occasioned many evils in the country, and filled the missionaries with anxious apprehensions for the morals of their young people. But whenever their faith and hope were ready to droop, the Lord rekindled their zeal in his service by giving them fresh proofs of the power of his grace to conquer the most corrupt passions of the human mind, and elicit from the most stubborn heart the tear of repentance. Although few of the neighbouring heathen were savingly affected by the gospel, many of the children born and baptized in the settlement, as they matured in age and understanding, experienced the converting influences of the holy Spirit; and, now and then, some who had strayed from the congregation and relapsed into sin, returned, and with true compunction of heart sought the forgiveness of the Lord and his people. Thus, in the year 1812, twenty-two persons of this description were added to the church; and at the close of that year, the whole number amounted to one hundred and twenty-six persons.

Fairfield, after enjoying tranquillity for more than twenty years, was on a sudden involved in all the troubles of war, in consequence of the contest between England and the United States. On the 2d of October, 1813, seventy sick English soldiers arrived at the settlement, and were accommodated in the school and the chapel. The dwellings, both of the missionaries and Indians had for some time been occupied by fugitives, whose number was daily increasing. The following day, however, the surgeon ordered the chapel to be cleared, that the usual Sunday's service might be performed.

On the 4th, the British General, Proctor, informed the missionaries that he was willing to purchase their houses, Indian corn, garden-fruits, furniture, and any thing else they could spare, for the use of the army; and promised that another tract of land should be given to the Christian Indians for a temporary residence during the war, and that they should be provided from the king's store with provision and clothing. The Indians being convinced that it would be dangerous to delay their departure any longer, left the settlement.

On the same day, an engagement took place between the American army and an English detachment, about a mile and a half from Fairfield, in which the latter were overpowered. General Proctor escaped with fifteen soldiers; the other regulars were either killed or taken prisoners, and the Indian auxiliaries escaped into the woods. In the evening a great number of Americans entered the settlement, chiefly on horseback. At first they pretended to be friendly, and promised to do no harm to the missionaries, nor take any of their private effects, and likewise expressed their regret that the Christian Indians had left the place, as they intended them no injury.*

The same night, however, they began to treat the missionaries with great severity, accused them of secreting king's stores and English officers; and, with fierce importunity, demanded that they should be delivered up. The assurances given that the accusation was not founded in truth, were of no avail. Every room and corner were searched, and particularly the roofs of the chapel and school. John Dolson, who, with his family, had fled hither, and two other men, were made prisoners, but were liberated on the following day. The Americans told brother Schnall, that he being a missionary was not to be considered as a prisoner of war; but that he must not be offended that his house would be guarded during the night. They were now ordered to open all their trunks and boxes for examination, and no person was permitted to go out of the house without a guard. The family could take no rest, but spent the night in silent prayer to the Lord, commending themselves and the white people who had sought refuge with them, to his almighty protection.

Very early the next morning the Americans began to plunder the settlement, and seized on all kinds of provisions. The missionaries were obliged to surrender their last morsel of bread: fifty bushels of potatoes, twelve of apples, all kinds of garden-stuff, and six hundred pounds of flour, which they had just purchased for winter's consumption, were taken from them, and ten bee-hives emptied of all the honey, without however destroying the bees.

The American general, Harrison, and several officers arrived during the plundering. Brother Schnall immediately waited upon him, and recommended the settlement to his protection, requesting, also, that some compensation might be made for what had been taken. His request was refused; but he was told that the missionaries were at liberty to quit the place. Commodore Perry, who was one of the party, meeting brother Schnall in the street, behaved with kindness, and said, he knew our society and respected our missions, and promised to procure a passport, that the missionaries might depart without being molested; which he likewise effected. After this interview he came several times to their house, by which their anxiety was in some measure relieved; some of the officers and privates also expressed pity for the hard treatment they had experienced. Some even used force to keep off the wild and lawless soldiery, who loaded the missionaries with the most bitter curses and mockeries. By this interposition they gained time to pack up their property. Commodore Perry now informed them, that he should soon leave the settlement, and advised them to make haste and get away, for if they staid after his departure, he would not answer for their being able to proceed. General Harrison likewise ordered them to hasten their flight. But, when in the act of loading the wagon, they were once more obliged to submit their baggage to a thorough search. Not the smallest article, however, was found, which could tend to impeach their character. They were obliged to leave all their furniture behind them. They had no sooner quitted the place, than part of it was set on fire, and on the following day the rest of the buildings were wholly consumed: not even the smallest out-house was spared.

* The fears of the Christian Indians were, however, well founded, and the remembrance of the events of 1782 justified their flight. [See p. 529.]

On the 15th the missionaries arrived at Detroit, where the commandant, General Cass, furnished them with a passport to go to Bethlehem. In prosecuting their journey they experienced various and great hardships, but also many signal proofs of the protection of the Lord.

When the news of the approach of an American detachment, and the defeat of the English, first reached Fairfield, our brethren there resolved that the missionary Schnall and his wife, together with Michael Young, who was aged and infirm, should go to Bethlehem; and brother Dencke and his wife remain with the Indians and share in their fate, whatever it might be. They cheerfully acceded to this proposal, determined even to devote their lives to this service.

The Indians, on leaving the settlement, had encamped about six miles higher up the river; but, being alarmed by reports brought by other fugitives, they had all fled into the woods; so that when the missionary arrived at the camp, he found it deserted, and for some time both he and the Indians remained ignorant of each other's situation. In this uncertainty, not knowing which way to direct their steps, they providentially met with a man, who offered to take them in his wagon to Delaware-town. On their way thither, besides other hardships, they had the mortification to be attacked by a gang of Kikkapoo and Shawanose robbers, who plundered them of the few articles of clothing which they had taken with them in their flight from Fairfield, and of the greater part of their other goods, together with their books and manuscripts, not leaving them even a Bible or Testament.

But they soon forgot the sorrow occasioned by these disasters when they reached Delaware-town, on the 12th of October. They had scarcely arrived before a number of the Fairfield Indians came running to meet them, and with tears in their eyes offered thanks to God for having thus brought them together again. Messengers were quickly dispatched into the woods to search for those who were still absent; for in their sudden flight parents were separated from children, and children from parents. They were soon collected together, and only one sister was missing, who had been murdered below Fairfield.

Having at length arrived near lake Ontario, the Indians built huts for themselves in the woods, a house for the missionary, and a chapel, which latter was opened for divine worship at Christmas 1813. At the close of that year the congregation consisted of one hundred and sixty members, besides twenty-three persons not yet baptized, but who had come to winter with them and regularly attended divine service. This situation being deemed rather unsafe, on account of its proximity to the lake and the superiority of the American fleet, they removed the following spring farther towards the mountains, about ten miles from Burlington Heights. One of their heaviest trials arose from the total stoppage of all communication with our congregations in America, and even several letters and parcels sent from England did not arrive. They were the more thankful, therefore, to the loyal and patriotic Society at York, (on lake Ontario,) who, without being solicited, remitted a hundred dollars to the missionary, with an intimation that, should it be needed, it would give them pleasure to render him further assistance, till he could command his own resources.

After the termination of the war they returned to Fairfield, and for some time dwelt in huts on the scite of the former buildings, till they had erected a new settlement, rather higher up on the opposite bank of the river, at a little distance from it. This place they began to inhabit towards the end of the summer of 1815, calling it New Fairfield; the number of inhabitants then amounted to one hundred and nine. Here they continued to enjoy rest and peace; the missionaries (whose number had been increased by the arrival of J. R. Schmidt from Bethlehem), prosecuting their calling with alacrity, and not without encouraging proofs that the Lord blessed their endeavours for the conversion of the heathen. A very striking instance of this they were favoured to witness in 1816, in the case of an Indian, called Onim, whom the Lord was pleased to make a miracle of grace in the fullest sense of the phrase.

This Indian had from his youth given evidence of his hostility against the mission. He was one of those who calumniated John Papunhank at Friedenshuetten. At that time he used to wear a tomahawk in his girdle, and when questioned what he intended to do with it, replied, "cleave the missionaries' sculls for deceiving the Indians." This enmity against the missionaries and the Christian Indians generally he manifested on all occasions, till within a few years, when the infirmities of age put a stop to his activity. The first sign of a change of sentiment in him was observed when he entertained the brethren Luckenbach and Zacharias in his cabin at the Monsy-town, on their way to Grand-river. Till then, he had always been lurking in the neighbourhood of our settlements, trying to create disturbances. And being a preacher among his countrymen, he used to dissuade them, by all the means in his power, from embracing the doctrines of the whites. "For," said he, "their skin is white and ours is brown; and our whole manner of life is entirely different from theirs: of course they must also have a different way of happiness; and those Indians who embrace their doctrine are altogether deceived." He taught the existence of three gods; a brown, a white, and a black god; and that each nation should live conformably to the directions received from the god of their colour. The Indians of course were to preserve their own religious ceremonies, their feasts, dances, sorceries, &c. He opposed, in particular, the gospel doctrine of the remission of sins; teaching his countrymen, that those who lived according to the will of the Great Good Spirit, would after this life go to him; but those who acted differently, would be banished to the haunts of the Evil Spirit. He believed not only in the immortality of the human soul, but even asserted, that all creatures, and also trees, and herbs, are inhabited by a living soul; accounting for the withering of the latter, when cut down, by saying, that their indwelling spirit then left them.

From what he said during his last illness, it should appear that he was led to reflect on his lost state by a remark, addressed to him by an Indian sister, Anna Paulina, who met him in December 1815 at the house of a sick woman, whom he was endeavouring to cure by his sorceries; for he had always pretended to great skill in this art. The following spring he was taken ill, on his way to Monsy-town, for the purpose of assisting at a feast to be held there. Unable to proceed further than New Fairfield, he returned to his friends, who had a camp near the settlement.

On the 10th of March 1816 he sent for brother Jacob, one of the native assistants, and, among other remarks, observed: "A word, lately spoken by one of your Christian Indians, has laid hold of my soul. I begin to be troubled in my mind, and to grow doubtful concerning my spiritual state. My constant cry is: Oh for some one to show me the right way." Having said more to the same effect, Jacob addressed him nearly in the following words: "Thou hast now told me a great deal; I will tell thee something too. Listen to me, Onim! I well remember that ever since I was a little child, thou hast often been with the congregation of Christian Indians, always going from and coming again to us. For many years thou hast heard the gospel which we believe. But till now, thou hast despised and ridiculed it, saying, 'I have another way to be saved according to my creation.'* But now, when thou art here in a miserable situation, lying on hard boards, unable to help thyself; thy little property spent in drinking; nobody taking care of thee, and death seeming to be at hand: now, dost thou say at last, 'I have brought terror on my mind, because I have been so wicked?' Oh, that these words of thine were but true! Would to God thou didst but feel real anxiety about thy condition! For then thy soul might yet be saved. Art thou indeed convinced that the devil hath deceived thee? Why art thou concerned about thyself at last, at the very end of thy life? In the days of thy health, thou hast despised and mocked at the Word of God; thou hast dissuaded and prevented others, who were disposed to believe; and thou hast tried to entice those away who joined the congregation. Thou hast made thy jest of the doctrine of the forgiveness of sins. But know thou, that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Creator of heaven and earth, became a man: this is the truth! He suffered, was tormented to death, and shed his precious blood for the remission of sins: this is also the truth! And unless thou obtain pardon of thy many and great sins, through faith in his blood, and thy heart be cleansed therewith, believe me, thou shalt after death go straightway to hell, into everlasting perdition. And there thou wilt find cause to accuse no one, neither men nor God, who made thee, but thyself, thyself alone. Nor will thy living with us, as thou desirest, avail thee any thing, unless thou be pardoned and purified from thy sins by the precious blood of Christ, whose mercy thou must earnestly seek. Reflect upon this, and recollect what thou hast formerly heard from us Christian Indians and our ministers."

The next day he was visited by the missionary Denke, who spoke to him in the same earnest and faithful manner. Among other questions, he asked him, whether it were true, that he had been a murderer and sorcerer? To this he replied: "The former is a false accusation; and sorcery is a deceit of the devil; it is naught: of this I am now convinced." With many tears he lamented his past wicked life, and made so affecting a confession of his faith in Jesus, that all present were melted into tears; and the work of grace, wrought in his heart by the Holy Ghost, was most strikingly manifest. Brother Denke then explained to him, that the mere rite of baptism could avail him nothing, unless he experienced in his heart, through faith, the purifying power of the blood of Christ; whereupon he exclaimed, "I believe! I believe! Do ye also have pity on me!"

His repentance appearing truly sincere, and his earnest request for baptism to proceed from an ardent desire of receiving this rite as a seal of the forgiveness of his sins and of acceptance with God through the sacrifice of Jesus, he was baptized in the name of the holy Trinity, and called Leonard. All his former doubts and fears now vanished: he truly enjoyed the peace of God in his soul, and continued in prayer day and night, almost till he drew his last breath, on the morning of the 13th, exalting the mercy of his Redeemer, and inviting all to come unto Him, that they might obtain pardon and remission of their sins. Addressing his countrymen, he said: "Formerly I spoke evil words to you, when you showed any desire to be converted, trying to dissuade you from it; forgive me for so doing, and follow my dying advice, which is, to forsake your wicked ways, or else you will be lost. Turn to your Saviour, and experience what I now feel, and you shall live."

"The solemnity attending this transaction," write the missionaries, "may more easily be conceived than described, and will not soon be forgotten by those who witnessed it. The Christian Indians were filled with joy, and exclaimed, 'Onim, our enemy, is become our brother Leonard!' The conversion and death of this extraordinary man will speak volumes to the heart of his late hearers; and the impression made thereby upon his heathen countrymen, cannot but, under God, prove highly favourable to the cause of the gospel."

In this hope they were not disappointed. A new awakening seemed to take place among the inhabitants of the settlement, which extended also to the children, and their separate meetings were distinguished by particular devotion and attention to the word of God. The remarkable conversion of Onim made a salutary impression, not only upon the Indians, but also upon many white people in that neighbourhood. Several heathen were baptized in 1817, and some, baptized in infancy, were solemnly received as members of the church. Thus the Lord was verifying unto them his promise: "In all places where I record my name, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee."

From the foregoing relation it appears, that the United Brethren have now continued their labours in propagating the gospel among the North American Indians for more than seventy years, and that at present they occupy three missionary stations, viz. New Fairfield in Canada, Goshen on the Muskingum, and Spring-place in the country of the Cherokees. The little success which has hitherto attended their endeavours, may probably have disappointed the reader's expectation. Were strenuous exertions, indefatigable labour, patient perseverance, constant self-denial and devoted zeal sufficient to insure success, our missionaries might indeed have collected a greater number of converts, as the preceding pages supply ample proof that they were not deficient in these qualifications. However, the blessing which has accompanied their efforts, verifies the divine promise, my word shall not return unto me void; while their comparatively small success as clearly demonstrates, that except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. Indeed the peculiar habits and roving disposition of the Indians, the frequent wars among themselves and the white people, and the introduction of the rum-trade, have always operated as strong barriers against the propagation of the gospel, and continue to throw impediments in the way of its converting influence, which nothing but Omnipotent grace can conquer.

From a register of the Indian congregation, dated 1772, it appears that the number of heathen baptized by our brethren from the commencement of the mission to that time, amounted to seven hundred and twenty. Of the subsequent years no authentic records remain, as the church-books and other manuscripts were lost at the destruction of the settlements on the Muskingum, and likewise during the warlike commotions in later years. In 1817, the year with which the narrative closes, the number of Christian Indians belonging to the three congregations of the Brethren, amounted to one hundred and fifty. The missionaries indeed are not anxious to collect great numbers of nominal Christians, but rather wish that those, whom they baptize, should give reasonable proofs that they truly desire to die unto sin and live unto righteousness. Respecting the number of Indians baptized by the Brethren, Heckewelder states the following: From the commencement of the mission among the Mohicans in the states of New York and Connecticut in 1740, and among the Delawares in Pennsylvania a year later, to the year 1808 inclusive, between thirteen and fourteen hundred souls were baptized by the Brethren. The exact number cannot be ascertained, on account of the loss of the church-registers; but as to hundreds, the number is not overrated.—Heckewelder's Narrative of the Missions, &c. p. 418.

CHAPTER IV.

MISSION IN SOUTH AMERICA.

The missionary labours of the United Brethren in South America have been hitherto confined to that part of the vast continent, which is known by the general name of Guiana. This territory lies on the northern coast, extending from the fourth to the seventh degree of north latitude. On this coast the Dutch, French and English have several possessions, the principal of which are Surinam, Berbice, Demerary, Cayenne and Essequibo. The climate is very unhealthy, being humid and sultry. The country is level, overgrown with impervious thickets and immense forests, the haunts of serpents and other venomous reptiles; it is also exposed to frequent inundations. The soil is uncommonly fertile, and vegetation so rapid, that several crops can be reaped in succession in a year. It is watered by several large rivers, near the mouths of which the European colonies are formed, and from which they derive their names.

The late bishop Spangenberg, (of whom mention was made in the preceding chapter,) on his way to England in 1731, passed through Holland. Here he had several consultations with the Directors of the Dutch Trading Company for Surinam, the result of which was, that the Brethren agreed to form one or more colonies in that country, with a view to the conversion of the heathen. Agreeably to the arrangements then made, three brethren proceeded to Surinam the following year, and spent some time in Paramaribo, in order to inquire on the spot into the practicability and best mode of establishing a mission in that quarter of the globe. After their return to Europe, a gentleman in Amsterdam requested that some of them would settle on one of his plantations on the Rio de Berbice, for the purpose of instructing his Negroes in Christianity. Considering this as a door opened to them for the enlargement of the kingdom of Christ, they cheerfully acceded to his request, and directed their first attention to the Negroes on his estates. But as their exertions were, in the sequel, extended to other parts of the coast, a brief relation of each of these shall now be given in separate sections.

SECTION I.

Pilgerhut on the Rio de Berbice.

In consequence of the offer above stated, two brethren, L. C. Daehne and J. Guettner, left Holland in June 1738, and arrived the following September in Berbice. As they brought strong recommendations with them from Holland, the stewards and managers of the estates suspected that they had been sent for the purpose of secretly inspecting their conduct; and on this account rendered their situation as unpleasant and difficult as possible. But God endowed them with faith and patience, and blessed the labour of their hands, so that, being content with very frugal fare, they could support themselves without depending on the favour of the stewards. Their greatest grievance was, that their situation precluded the possibility of obtaining the principal object of their residence in the country. Unacquainted with the language of the slaves, they had not even a prospect of learning it, as the rigour with which these poor creatures were treated, rendered it extremely difficult to have any intercourse with them.

In the midst of this perplexity God himself provided for them. A gentleman of the Surinam Trading Company, without their solicitation, offered them a retired and tranquil residence on his estate. Thankful for this providential direction, they moved to the place pointed out, where they took possession of a small tenement, and tilled a piece of ground, lying in the midst of a forest, about a hundred miles distant from the sea coast, and called it Pilgerhut. This gentleman likewise procured from the President of the Surinam Company in Holland a recommendation of the Brethren, so favourable in its tenor, that the governor, who had hitherto been rather inimically disposed, felt compelled to give them no further molestation.

Having thus obtained rest from without, they began to visit the Indians in that neighbourhood, some of whom understood a little Dutch. They soon gained the love and confidence of these good-natured people, who with apparent pleasure listened to the instructions they endeavoured to give them concerning God, the Creator and Redeemer of man. But, as their ideas of God and divine things were few and exceedingly obscure, the missionaries clearly saw that very little could be effected till they had learnt the language, and for the acquisition of this, the labour necessary for their support left them but little leisure. They, therefore, requested the directors of the missions to send out a married couple to manage the temporal concerns of their little settlement.

The Brethren in Europe having meanwhile gained a more correct knowledge of the Surinam mission, and obtained a formal concession from the Surinam Company to establish a regular settlement on that river, five brethren were sent thither in the year 1739, and this company was further augmented the following year by the arrival of Fr. Regnier, M. D. and his wife. As they could not immediately purchase a piece of ground in an eligible situation, they took lodgings in the town of Paramaribo. Here they became acquainted with a pious citizen, Abraham Boemper, who built a small house for them. Their whole establishment was very poor, but they lived together in peace and brotherly love; God blessed the labour of their hands, and, notwithstanding their mean fare and the inconvenience of their dwelling, their health did not suffer, which they remarked as a particular providence, for in general the climate of Surinam is so injurious to the constitution of Europeans, that more than one half die almost immediately on their arrival. Their family devotions were frequented by great numbers, among whom were many Jews. This excited observation, and, through the machinations of their enemies, they were strictly forbidden by the ecclesiastical and civil authorities, to grant any strangers admission to their religious meetings. After some time they succeeded in purchasing a plantation, about a mile from the town, which they cultivated with their own hands and with the assistance of three Negroes whom Mr. Boemper lent them. Many white people again attended their family devotions and became convinced of the purity of their doctrine and the probity of their intentions. But, finding it impossible to attain the proper object of their calling in this place, they sold their land and premises and bought a small plantation on the river Cottika, where they lived in the immediate neighbourhood of the Indians. No permanent advantage, however, was gained by this removal. They could have very little intercourse with the Indians, their knowledge of the Arawak language being still extremely defective; their harmony was interrupted and dissensions arose among them. These circumstances led to the final relinquishment of this station in 1745. After this digression we now return to the settlement on the Rio de Berbice.

With a view to assist the missionaries in Pilgerhut, Henry Beutel and his wife went thither in 1739; and two years after their number was further increased by the arrival of John Grabenstein and his wife. The brotherly love prevailing among them sweetened all their external hardships and poverty, and rendered them cheerful amidst their incessant manual labours.

This circumstance, however, greatly retarded the progress of the mission with regard to its most important object, though Pilgerhut possessed many local advantages for obtaining it. It was situate at some distance from other European settlements, many Indians resided in its neighbourhood, and the savages were continually travelling through the place, so that hardly a day passed on which the missionaries were not visited by individuals, or whole companies. But these favourable circumstances could be but little improved by them. Their number was too small to attend both to the temporal concerns of the settlement and to the preaching of the gospel, which required not only a more perfect knowledge of the language of the heathen, but also frequent visits to them in their own habitations, and demanded their undivided time and attention. Both these difficulties were shortly after removed. For, when the establishment on the Cottika was abandoned in 1745, two of the missionaries moved to Pilgerhut, and two brethren with their wives arrived from Europe. This accession of numbers enabled them more regularly to distribute the necessary labour in the mission, some attending chiefly to its temporal concerns, while others devoted themselves more especially to the work of the ministry.

About the same time a gentleman presented them with a mulatto boy, who assisted them in acquiring a more correct knowledge of the Arawak language. He was in the sequel converted to God, and they found him of great use, as an interpreter, in their attempts to preach to the heathen. They now made frequent visits among the savages, travelling a circuit of three hundred miles through a vast wilderness. These journeys were attended with great dangers and difficulties. They were obliged to carry their provisions with them, wade through broad and deep rivers, or hastily construct a raft to cross them, and often to spend the night in the forest, sleeping in their hammocks, suspended from trees. And, what was still more distressing, if they came to an Indian hut, and the men were not at home, the women, who were always terrified at the approach of white people, set up a great shriek and ran into the wood; and thus their toils and fatigues had been endured in vain. Not deterred by this, they persevered in their benevolent exertions, and their kind and affable deportment, by degrees, conciliated the affections and won the confidence of the savages.

Assisted by their mulatto boy, they compiled a concise narrative of the life and sufferings of Christ, in the Arawak language subjoining a brief summary of the fundamental doctrines of the gospel. This tract they took with them when visiting the Indians, read it to them, and expatiated on its contents, accompanying their exhortations with fervent prayer. The mulatto youth himself now became a preacher of righteousness, and addressed the savages in so striking a manner, that they were powerfully affected, and circulated among their countrymen the news of the great word which they had heard.

Thus after a residence in this country of nearly nine years, amidst many heavy trials, and without seeing any fruit from their labours, the time arrived, when, after having sown in tears, they were favoured to reap in joy. Towards the close of 1747 they had the satisfaction, which they had so long and ardently prayed for, to perceive that the Divine Spirit was exciting a real hunger after the word of God among the Arawaks. They frequently visited them, burning with desire to hear more of Christ crucified. This inflamed the zeal of the missionaries to return their visits; and the very women, who had formerly fled on their approach, now became their guides through the wood. Passing by the huts of such as were disposed to mock and ridicule their endeavours, they conducted them to those dwellings of the Indians where they knew they would find eager hearers. Wherever they came they met with a warm reception; all the inhabitants seated themselves around them and listened to their discourse with the greatest silence and eagerness.

In March, 1748, the first Arawak Indian obtained admission to the church of Christ by holy baptism. It was an old woman, decrepid with age and scarce able to walk. About forty of the savages were present at this solemn transaction, and it made such a deep impression upon them, that they were suffused in tears. Several men came the next day, and with much importunity begged to be admitted to the same privilege. The change, wrought in the baptized, was visible in their very countenances and appeared in their whole conduct. This, together with their conversation among their friends, had such an effect, that hardly a week passed in which this sacred rite was not administered to one or more converts on their profession of faith in Jesus. Thus, already, by the end of June, the baptized amounted to thirty-nine, among whom were several venerable old people.

Many of the converts could not endure the thoughts of leaving the missionaries and again returning to their former places of abode, and therefore requested permission to erect some huts on the land of the settlement, promising to cultivate a piece of ground for their support. The missionaries the more joyfully acceded to this proposal, as by having them thus constantly near them, they would be the better able to teach them to observe all things whatsoever Jesus hath commanded. This outweighed every consideration of the trouble and expense, unavoidably connected with such an arrangement, as they must maintain all these people till the cassabi, sown on the new ground, was ready to reap; for most of the produce of their former fields had been stolen by the savages. By the end of the year eighty Indians, including children, lived in the settlement.

Before our Brethren in Europe could receive any intelligence of this awakening, the directors of the missions had come to a resolution to appoint a man of learning to superintend the establishment at Pilgerhut, conceiving that he would more easily acquire a knowledge of the language and other local circumstances. They found a person, well qualified and willing to undertake it, in Theoph. Sol. Schuman, late a tutor in the Protestant cloister of Bergen in Saxony. He arrived in the country in the autumn of 1748, and in one year acquired such proficiency in the language, that he could translate several portions of the holy scriptures and converse with the natives without an interpreter. He ended his useful and active life here, October 6th, 1760, after serving this and the other missionary institutions of the Brethren in Guiana, for twelve years, with indefatigable zeal and faithfulness, during which period he made two visits to Europe in concerns of the mission.

While the missionaries were filled with joy and gratitude for the success attending their endeavours, and counted no difficulties or labours, which might in any degree tend to further the noble cause in which they had embarked, too hard, the adversaries were not remiss in their attempts to oppose this growing work. Some white people, displeased with the conversion of the Indians, tried to make them jealous of the missionaries. And when this did not succeed, they insinuated that the numerous assemblies at Pilgerhut might tend to excite a rebellion, and that it would be wise in government positively to prohibit these meetings for the future.

However, the governor, Mr. Loesner, paid no attention to these representations, but on every occasion testified the pleasure he felt in contemplating the blessing of God, which so evidently rested on the labours of the missionaries. But it was not long before an unfavourable change took place in the government. Mr. Loesner received his dismission, and though he most warmly recommended the mission to his successor, it soon appeared that this gentleman was not very favourably disposed. Shortly after his arrival he summoned the missionaries to appear before the council. On their appearance he read to them the orders of the directors in Amsterdam, requiring their taking a formal oath, adding, that, in case of refusal, he would send them by the first ship back to Europe. Brother Schuman answered, that as some of them had scruples of conscience against taking an oath, they would abide by the declaration made on their arrival in the country, and, in case of a breach of their simple affirmation, they would consider themselves liable to the same penalty as if they had been guilty of perjury. Having with modesty and firmness replied to some other questions, and remonstrated against several restrictions, intended to be imposed on their labours; their adversaries were silenced, and the council finally resolved, that their simple affirmation should be accepted instead of an oath.

The enemies of the mission, who for some time had rather too loudly expressed their joy at its approaching destruction, finding themselves thus unexpectedly disappointed, again resorted to their former contrivance, and endeavoured to render the Indians suspicious of the missionaries, by insinuating that they would make them slaves. But, though the idea of slavery was more formidable to these people than death itself, they were so firmly persuaded of the sincerity and affection of their teachers, that the white people effected nothing by these base insinuations. Thus the missionaries enjoyed a season of rest and tranquillity, and the number of the congregation was gradually increased.

In the beginning of the year 1750 a deputation of eleven savages arrived at Pilgerhut, from the Spanish possession on the river Oronoco. These people had been visited by one of the Christian Indians, and his conversation had made such an impression upon their minds, that they now came to hear the great word from the missionaries themselves. Their embassy led to the result, that in the sequel, several pagans from that territory (a distance of about eight or ten days' journey) embraced the gospel and settled at Pilgerhut. A visit made by some of the converts to their relatives on the river Corentyn, was followed by consequences equally pleasing. Their testimony of the grace they had experienced excited the astonishment of their friends, who sent a deputation of seven men to Pilgerhut to inquire what the good news was, which the missionaries announced to the Indians in the name of their Creator. Before the end of the year, several companies, consisting of fifteen or twenty persons, came from those parts to settle at Pilgerhut. The missionaries remark: "It is impossible to behold these people without deep emotion. There are some very aged persons among them, who have come hither, on crutches, a journey of four or five days. They have left a district where they had abundance of provisions, and now are satisfied with a very small pittance, that they may daily hear of Jesus. Without reckoning those who occasionally visit us, there are at present three hundred belonging to our congregation, of whom two hundred live in the settlement."

Scarce had they been enlivened by this pleasing progress of the mission, when new troubles broke out. Their enemies, at home and abroad, were still secretly plotting the ruin of their establishment. One of the directors of the Surinam Trading Company arrived from Holland with unlimited powers to make such regulations as should be deemed most advantageous to the trade. This gentleman lent a willing ear to the complaints, that the endeavours of the missionaries for the conversion of the Indians were injurious to the interests of the company. In November, brother Schuman was summoned before him and the governor. The former, in an imperious tone, demanded that the missionaries should not draw the Indians to their settlement, but let them live dispersed in the woods; that they should clothe their converts, and pay a personal tax for them, equivalent to that charged on the white people. He more particularly insisted that the Indians should be required to lend their services to the Dutch colony, and that the missionaries should be compelled to take the oath prescribed, perform military duty, and appear on the parade. To every one of these demands Schuman replied in so satisfactory and convincing a manner, that the conscience of the director was touched, and he remarked, not without considerable emotion, "that he knew the Brethren were quiet, peaceable and regular people, but that he was not authorized to exempt them from bearing arms and taking oaths. If his superiors in Holland would grant them a dispensation from these duties, he would not only make no objections, but assist them as far as he could, and allow them eight months in order to refer their petition to the mother-country." He dismissed Schuman with expressions of kindness, and a few days after was suddenly removed by death.

The vexations of the missionaries, however, did not terminate here. Once the governor sent some soldiers to Pilgerhut, who forcibly compelled two of the Christian Indians to serve in the colony. This so terrified the rest, that many of them fled into the forest: by degrees, however, they all returned. When new missionaries arrived in 1751, they were again commanded to take an oath, and those who had scruples of conscience on this point, were obliged to return in the same ship to Europe. This greatly increased the labours of those who remained, especially as one of them, after six years faithful service, departed this life.

For several years no further impediments were thrown in the way of their operations. Their plain but zealous testimony of the death and resurrection of Jesus had a mighty influence in convincing the heathen of sin, and establishing their converts in the obedience of faith. The visits of savages from distant regions still continued; and through them the knowledge of the gospel was widely diffused. Many came and took up their residence at Pilgerhut; among whom were some of the rudest and most ferocious tribe, being considered even by the Arawaks as the greatest barbarians, for they feast upon the flesh of those whom they have taken and killed in war. But the word of the cross tamed these tigers in human shape, and changed their ferocity into the meekness of the lamb.

The congregation increased in grace, and evidenced their faith by a conduct and conversation consistent with their Christian profession, and by the simple utterances of their feelings when they described the change wrought in them by divine grace, and their desire to press forward to the mark set before them. One of them, wishing to write to our brethren in Europe, dictated the following: "Having arrived at manhood, I spent many years without any knowledge of my Saviour. When I afterwards became desirous to experience what I heard, it was granted me. Jesus has cleansed me in his blood, and delivered me from my disobedience. This truth, that he died and shed his blood for me, hath conquered and captivated my heart: this I can never forget; and therefore will I love him with all my soul, and daily give my whole heart to him. I fervently pray that he will keep me, and never suffer me to stray from him, or lose the impression of his death and sufferings. His love to me is astonishingly great, therefore hath he drawn me to himself." Another expressed himself thus: "I love my Creator with my whole heart, and I rejoice that when I leave this earth I shall go to him, and worship at his feet, who hath washed me from my sins in his own blood. He gives me eternal life. He knows my heart. I had gone astray from him; but he appeared and took away my polluted, evil and flinty heart, and gave me a heart of flesh: for his blood hath purified and softened it. It remains indelibly impressed on my mind that he hath shed his blood for me. He has granted me the grace, that I can leave this world in assured hope, and full of joy go to him and behold him as he is." In this confident expectation of eternal glory the missionaries saw several of their converts quit this stage of life; the fear of death, so natural to them in their pagan state, being completely vanquished by faith and the hope of immortality.

Another circumstance which greatly promoted the prosperity of the mission was, that about this time several of the converts were sufficiently advanced in knowledge, and prepared by the Spirit of God, to assist in preaching the gospel. These assistants afforded the missionaries essential service, especially in visiting and discoursing with the savages, and likewise in accompanying their Christian countrymen, when going out to hunt, or fish, or till their fields, which lay at some distance in the woods. On these occasions pretty large parties used to go together and be several days, or even weeks, away from the settlement. The assistants who accompanied them held daily meetings for prayer and exhortation; endeavoured to preserve good order and maintain brotherly love among them; and gave in reports to the missionaries, with a view that, as far as possible, every thing might be averted which might tend to injure the cause of the gospel. They had now within the space of eight years, since God began visibly to bless their labours, baptized three hundred and sixty-seven persons, of whom forty-eight had died. At the close of the year 1756 there lived at Pilgerhut two hundred and thirty-three persons, besides some children not yet baptized; and, reckoning the converts who resided in the neighbourhood, the whole number amounted to upwards of three hundred.

This hopeful progress of the work was about this time slightly threatened by a demand made by the new governor, M. Van Ryswyk, that they should send all those Christian Indians, who belonged to the Berbice territory, away. But, upon proper representation, that not one in ten of those who lived in the settlement had come from that territory, and that they never wished to interfere with the affairs of the Dutch colony, he withdrew his demand, commended their benevolent exertions, and ever after befriended them.

Under these favourable auspices they and their flock of converted Indians began the year 1757 with joy and thanksgiving, happily unconscious of the heavy sufferings which a God, infinitely wise and righteous in all his works, in the sequel permitted to assail them, doubtless to try their faith and constancy. The wife of brother Schuman having unexpectedly departed this life, while he was at Paramaribo on concerns of the mission, he found it necessary to visit Europe in 1758. Thus Pilgerhut was left without an ordained minister, and the two missionaries who resided there, and had hitherto assisted in the ministry, did not think themselves authorized to baptize or dispense the Lord's Supper. And an ordained minister, who was expected from North America, did not arrive, as he could find no ship bound for Surinam. This proved injurious to the spiritual course of the congregation. To add to their discouragements, a contagious disease broke out the following year, and raged for many months, spreading consternation and death throughout the whole country. Not less than forty of the Christian Indians died within one year; and as numbers had left the settlement, and many of those who remained were confined by illness, divine service was often attended by no more than ten or twelve persons. This distress was further augmented by a dearth of provisions in the Berbice territory.

When brother Schuman returned, in the spring of 1760, he found the congregation greatly diminished, and the whole country in the most deplorable situation. Nearly one half of the Dutch colonists, and also the governor, had been carried off by the prevailing epidemic. His arrival, however, revived the faith of the missionaries, and diffused new life through the congregation. But their joy was of short duration; for in less than six months after his return, it pleased the Great Head of his church to call him to his eternal rest. His removal appeared an irreparable loss to the mission; and the wound inflicted by this event, was opened afresh a few weeks after, when two active young brethren, who had come with him from Europe, likewise finished their earthly pilgrimage.

The contagion still raged with unabated violence, and the famine became so general, and rose to such a pitch, that the Indians for months had nothing to sustain life but wild roots and fruits. The missionaries indeed obtained a scanty supply from Paramaribo; but their fare was exceedingly frugal, and it occasioned frequent attacks of illness. In consequence of these calamities Pilgerhut was almost deserted, and this settlement, which a couple of years before contained nearly four hundred inhabitants, was at the end of 1762 reduced to twenty-two.

Still the missionaries were determined not to abandon their post; but, in hope of better times, patiently to persevere in their labours. Towards the end of February 1763, however, an event occurred which would have rendered it the height of presumption to remain there any longer. In the night preceding the first of March and the following day, they were alarmed by the discharge of cannon, and in the evening they received authentic intelligence that all the Negroes had risen in rebellion, murdering several white people, and obliging the rest to fly.

The insurgents had already cut off all communication with the fort by land or water. The next day, hearing that the rebels were within a few miles of the settlement, they resolved to proceed without loss of time to Demarary. They effected their escape by water in two companies; the missionaries Beutel and Climan, together with the wife of the former and the widow Bambay, still remaining at Pilgerhut, in order, if possible, to retain possession of it. But for the sake of safety they spent the night in the wood. The fugitives encamped in a thick forest on the banks of a small river, about nine miles from Pilgerhut. Of the subsequent events, Beutel, one of those who had remained in the settlement, gives the following relation:

"March 5th I went to Matare to learn the disposition of the Negroes towards us. They told me that they would not harm us, well knowing that the Brethren had not done them any hurt; but they could not be answerable for the more embittered Negroes, who threatened to murder all the white people, and intended to come to Pilgerhut that day. On receiving this intelligence we penetrated farther into the wood, and encamped there. Here we were visited by seven Negroes, whose looks were rather savage: but they departed in peace, after taking two of our best guns, promising not to injure us, as we were good people. We, however, thought it most prudent now to join the rest of our brethren. Upon this some of the missionaries immediately proceeded to Demarary, where they met with a kind and hospitable reception. Climan, Vester and myself went once more to the settlement to fetch away such of our things as had not been taken by the Negroes, and on the 2d of April we commenced our final emigration.

Having at length arrived at Demarary, Mr. Finnet very kindly provided us with the necessary accommodations on his estate; and the Christian Indians who came with us, likewise, found here the needful means of support."

During this insurrection the fort had been burnt, and the whole country laid waste. The Brethren lost property to a very considerable amount; but they regretted nothing so much as the loss of the Arawak Grammar and Dictionary, which had been compiled with immense labour by the late brother Schuman.

Thus terminated the once flourishing mission on the Rio de Berbice. Most of the missionaries returned to Europe; and Climan and Vester, who still remained in Demarary, shortly after finished their early career. The few Indian converts who had come with them from Pilgerhut, went afterwards to the settlement which had been begun a few years before in the territory of Surinam.

SECTION II.

Sharon on the Saramacca.

The reader will recollect that the establishment begun by the Brethren in the territory of Surinam on the river Cottika, was abandoned in 1745. However, the idea of commencing a mission in this district was not entirely relinquished, and events soon occurred which rendered it very desirable to make new efforts in these parts. The land belonging to Pilgerhut was found insufficient for the maintenance of the many Christian Indians who resided there. This led to their frequent dispersion, which proved detrimental to their progress in Christian knowledge and practice. The directors of the missions being desirous of removing these impediments, sent two brethren, C. Daehne (who had been in the country before, but had returned to Europe,) and Mark Ralfs, to Paramaribo, for the purpose of inquiring into the practicability of forming one or more missionary settlements in the territory of Surinam. They arrived on the last day of the year 1751, hired a private lodging, and worked at their trades, with a view to watch a favourable opportunity for effecting their purpose. Through the friendly interference of Mr. Loesner, they found in the present governor, Van der Meer, a kind friend and benefactor, who was willing to promote their design. They had, however, to wait till the year 1756, before they could obtain the consent of the government in Holland, together with a renewal of those privileges which had been conceded to the Brethren in 1740.

Every needful preparation being thus made, two married missionaries who had formerly resided in the country and understood the language, together with five unmarried brethren, left Holland, and arrived in Surinam in November. They were accompanied by Nicholas Garrison, formerly a naval captain, who had volunteered his services to navigate the rivers and assist in surveying the land granted to them. They entered upon this business before the end of the month, and succeeded in surveying and laying out a considerable tract of land for two settlements; the one on the river Corentyn, and the other on the Saramacca. The hardships and dangers attending this undertaking were almost incredible, but God often helped them in the most wonderful manner.

When they arrived in the mouth of the Corentyn, Grabenstein, one of the missionaries, grew so ill, that they were obliged to sail up the river with all possible expedition to bring him to the house of the postmaster, where he expired in a few days. Captain Garrison, though he had made many long and perilous voyages, was often thrown into the greatest perplexity. He writes himself: "When we reached the mouths of rivers with which I was totally unacquainted, we were frequently in the most imminent danger of suffering shipwreck, and of losing our provisions and every thing else on board. That we escaped these disasters I ascribe not to my own skill, nor to any human aid, for there was none within our reach, but to the invisible agency of divine Providence. All the brethren, except Daehne and myself, were sick. Our difficulties were not a little increased, as we had to transact our business in the rainy season, which this year was uncommonly severe. In measuring the land we had constantly to wade in water, and more than once Daehne and I spent forty-eight hours in heavy rain in a small canoe."

Amidst many and great difficulties, and by means of indefatigable exertions, they succeeded in taking possession of a large piece of land, capable of supplying a numerous congregation of Indians with the means of subsistence, the soil being very fertile, and fit for the cultivation of sugar, coffee, cocoa, cotton, &c. besides cassibi, which is their daily food. Early in spring, 1747, the missionaries began to build and plant, and called the place Sharon.

Desirable as the situation of the new settlement was, its erection was in the beginning attended with various difficulties. In consequence of their incessant labours in building houses and improving the land, the missionaries fell sick one after the other. For five or six months they could reap nothing from their own plantations; and the Indians who resided with them were, as yet, too few in number to obtain much by the chase or by fishing. They were under the necessity of procuring most of their provisions from Paramaribo; and, till they got a boat of their own, this was not easy, for the Negroes who carried them had to cross an extensive swamp, where, in the rainy season, they were obliged to wade up to the middle in water. In the sequel they obtained a little sloop of their own, and some of the Indians were always found willing to go with her and fetch provisions. On one of these voyages, as they were returning to Sharon, a Spanish ship, cruising along the coast, sent a boat to their vessel to plunder; but one of the Indians, who could speak Spanish, answered their questions with great freedom, adding, "You must take none of these things; they belong to the Brethren on the Saramacca, who teach us the way of salvation; they want these things, and our Creator knows and sees all you are doing." These remarks, flowing from the lips of an Indian, reached the consciences of these rude people, and they returned to their ship without taking any thing.

The missionaries considered themselves more than compensated for all their external trials by the hopeful prospect, that a numerous congregation of believing Indians would be collected in this settlement. Among its first inhabitants who had come from Pilgerhut and other places, grace, simplicity and brotherly love prevailed, and the work of the Spirit of God evidenced itself in young and old, not excepting even the children. Visits from the neighbouring heathen likewise became very frequent, among whom were many of the Carribbee tribe. These came in companies of from ten to twenty at a time, and listened with eagerness to the conversations of the missionaries and their assistants. Several, after a short time, returned, took up their abode at Sharon, and received the seed of the Word in a good and honest heart, bringing forth the fruits of righteousness; while others, who could not be admitted into the settlement, formed small colonies in the vicinity.

Suddenly, however, this bright prospect was darkened by a gathering storm. The establishment of the Brethren on the Saramacca was exceedingly disliked by the Bush-Negoes, who lived in the adjacent woods, and whose habitations were safe asylums for runaway Negro slaves. But the flight of the latter was rendered very difficult by the many villages now building by the Carribbees on the Saramacca, and who lay in wait for the fugitives, as government allowed them fifty florins for every runaway slave they seized. The Bush-Negroes, therefore, resolved to destroy Sharon, hoping thus to compel the Indians to leave the country. Some of these marauders were occasionally seen lurking about the settlement, but they precipitately retreated into the woods on discovering any Carribbees, of whom they stood greatly in awe. They, however, watched their opportunity; and having received certain information that all the Carribbees had emigrated, in consequence of a scarcity of provisions, a number of them advanced towards Sharon, lying for some days concealed in the woods. On Sunday, January the 25th, 1761, as the congregation was returning from divine service, the Negroes sallied forth, and with a hideous noise commenced an attack, using both fire-arms and bows and arrows. They killed three aged Indians in their huts and took eleven prisoners, but were afraid to approach the mission-house, as they observed persons with guns stationed in the inside. They, therefore, placed themselves behind trees, from whence they fired at the house, whereby one of the missionaries was wounded in the arm. Our brethren, however, maintained their post till the enemies succeeded in setting fire to the premises. In making their escape, one had his forehead slightly grazed by an arrow. The Negroes did not pursue them; but, having plundered the settlement, retreated with precipitancy, afraid of an attack from the Carribbees, some of whom were now returning. The fugitive missionaries went first to the plantations on the Coropina, and then proceeded to Paramaribo. Thither they were accompanied by some of their converts, the rest took refuge in Ephrem and other places.

The missionaries Schirmer and Clive, with a company of Indians, soon returned to Sharon; and as no immediate danger was to be apprehended from the Bush-Negroes, others followed in a short time. For the sake of greater security, the governor sent an officer with fourteen men to the settlement; but their presence proved no edification to the Indians, and was attended with many inconveniences. In other respects, too, the situation of the missionaries was extremely distressing. The house they inhabited was in a most ruinous state; frogs and toads crawled on the floor, and bats and other creatures took possession of the roof, which was but imperfectly covered. They were frequently in want of the necessaries of life; and the few Indians living with them being often sick, were consequently unable to hunt, or fish, or fetch provisions; and the soldiers, without ceremony, took the fruits of their plantations. For several weeks both missionaries were so ill that they could not leave their hammocks, and had nothing to live upon but bread and water. Towards the end of the year, however, their courage was considerably strengthened by the arrival of three missionaries from Europe; but how inscrutable are the councils of God! Two of them departed this life in a few days after their arrival, and in less than twelve months two of the survivors likewise entered into the rest which remains for the people of God.

Hitherto the Christian Indians, alarmed by false reports of meditated attacks from the Negroes, had often fled into the forests; and being thus deprived of the instruction of the missionaries, were rather declining in their religious profession. But by the grace of God they were brought to serious reflection; and in the year 1762 most of them returned, and with penitent tears besought their teachers to take them anew into their care. This request, which was most readily granted, served to animate their zeal and revive their fainting hopes.

Thus Sharon once more assumed the appearance of a promising station; and its Indian inhabitants, about sixty in number, enjoyed peace and rest; and walking in the comforts of the Holy Ghost, were edified. Peace being established between the government and the Bush-Negroes, the missionaries indulged the pleasing hope, that many of the Arawaks who had formerly been baptized, but were scattered in the wilderness during the late troubles, would now return. In this hope, however, they were disappointed, as the fear entertained by the Indians of the Negroes rather increased after peace had been made. For, in spite of their professions of friendship, their conduct when visiting Sharon was not the most conciliatory. Some secret enemies, hoping to accelerate the ruin of the settlement, tried by false reports to terrify the Arawaks still more. Many of the inhabitants left the settlement and fled into the woods. Their dwellings being soon occupied by others, the missionaries did not relax in their exertions; but, both by their instructions at home, and by frequent visits through the country, endeavoured to diffuse the glad tidings of grace and redemption through the blood of Christ.

It was not long, however, before they were threatened with new dangers from the Negroes, which seemed to render the occupation of Sharon, as a missionary settlement, very precarious. Besides this, vast swarms of large ants had almost totally destroyed their plantations, and thus deprived them of the principal means of subsistence. These and other circumstances led to the final relinquishment of this station in 1779.

A few years before the evacuation of the settlement, brother Schirmer had departed this life and entered into the joy of his Lord, after having for the space of fourteen years endured hardships as a good soldier of Christ on this difficult post. In October, 1776, brother Christopher Lewis Schuman, son of the late missionary of that name, arrived at Sharon, principally with a view of devoting himself to the service of the Carribbees. His attempts in this respect, however, proved unsuccessful; but he zealously served the mission in many other ways.

SECTION III.

Hope on the Corentyn.

In order to take possession of the land surveyed on the river Corentyn, as mentioned in the preceding section, brother Daehne went thither in April, 1757, accompanied by a few Indians, who assisted in clearing a piece of ground and building a hut; but in a short time they all went away except one, called Christopher; and even he, falling sick a few months after, was obliged to return to his friends. Thus the missionary was left alone in this horrid wilderness, the haunt of tigers, serpents of enormous size, and various reptiles, whose bite or sting is venomous. He had not been long here before he was seized with a fever; but by the timely assistance of brother Schuman, who had a slight knowledge of medicine, and who immediately hastened to his relief, he recovered. An account of the hardships and dangers he encountered in this solitary abode, as well as of the almost miraculous preservation of his life, will be read with the greatest interest in his own words.

"The Indians," says he, "who were continually passing by, often inquired into the reason of my building a hut in this lonesome place; whether I did it by my own or the governor's authority? I told them I did it for their sakes, to make them acquainted with the true God, the only Saviour. They answered, 'The Indians have determined to kill you.' At length, the soldiers at the fort sent me word that I was not safe, and invited me to come and live near them. I thanked them for their care, but determined to stay where I might be favoured to gain if it were but one soul for Christ.

"One evening, being unwell and going to lie down in my hammock, upon entering the door of my hut, I perceived a large serpent descending upon me from a shelf near the roof. In the scuffle the creature stung or bit me two or three times in the head; and, pursuing me very closely, twined herself several times round my head and neck.* Supposing that this would be the occasion of my death, and apprehending that the Indians would be charged with it, I wrote with chalk upon the table, 'A serpent has killed me.' But, on a sudden, that promise of our Saviour to his disciples was impressed upon my mind: 'They shall take up serpents, and it shall not hurt them' (Mark xvi. 18); and, seizing the creature with great force, I tore her loose, and flung her out of the hut. I then laid down to rest in the peace of God.

"There was also a tiger, who, for a long time, kept near my hut, watching, perhaps, an opportunity to seize its inhabitant. He roared dreadfully every evening; but I made a large fire near the hut before I went to bed; however, as my fire often went out, it would have been but a poor defence if the Lord had not protected me.

"In November, the Carribbee Indians resolved to put their threats against me into execution. One day, as I sat at dinner, about fixty of them arrived in canoes, and surrounded my hut. This was indeed a frightful sight. Some were armed with swords, other with tomahawks. I immediately went out to them, and bid them welcome in the Arawak language. They answered in a surly tone, saying I should speak the Carribbee language. I told them I could not speak it. Upon this they began to speak with each other, every now and then addressing me, to find out whether I understood them or not. Perceiving that I did not even guess their meaning, they called their Arawak interpreter, and asked me who had given me leave to build on their land. I answered, 'The governor; and that I had a writing under his own hand to prove what I said.' They then asked what views I had in coming hither? Upon this I went up to their chief, and said with great freedom, 'I have brethren on the other side of the great ocean, who, having heard that many Indians that are ignorant of their Creator live on this river, out of love to them have sent me hither, to tell you of your Creator's love to you, and what he has done to save you; and more of my brethren will come hither for the same purpose.' He asked, 'Whether I was a clergyman, a Frenchman, or a Dutchman? I answered, 'I came from Holland, but was sent by my brethren, who loved them, and wished to do them good.' He then said, 'Have you never heard that the Indians intend to kill you?' I answered, 'Yes; but I cannot believe it. You have among your Indians some who have lived with me, and they can tell you that I am a real friend of the Indians.' 'Yes,' replied he, 'I have heard so; and they say that you are a different sort of Christian from the white people in general.' I then said, 'I am your friend; how is it that you are come to kill me?' He answered. 'We have done wrong.' Upon this every countenance seemed altered, and the party dispersed. The chief remained with me, and inquired whether other people would come to live here; and when I assured him that none but my brethren would come, he was pleased, and behaved very kindly. When he was going away, I perceived that he had some cassabi in his pouch. I asked him for it, as his people could get more, and I was here alone and in want, adding 'If you should at any time pass by, and be hungry, I will also give you something to eat.' He immediately gave orders to give me some cassabi, some fish, and drink, and then took leave, saying he would often come to see me. Thus our Saviour delivered me from them, and preserved me amidst daily dangers; so that at the close of the year I had great cause to thank and adore him in the dust.

* Probably one of those serpents which, though their bite is not poisonous, by twisting themselves tightly round the body of their prey, break its bones, and thus quickly extinguish life.

"I entered into the year 1758 with a confident heart, and felt the peace and presence of God. I was busily employed in clearing the ground and felling trees; and when weary, I frequently desired the Indians passing that way to lend a helping hand, which they did with pleasure. Once, while gathering wood for fuel, some large black ants fixed upon my hand, and by their stings gave me such excruciating pain that for some time I was almost senseless. These creatures are nearly two inches long, and quite black. The Indians are as much afraid of them as of serpents. As to externals, this was for me a year of great want. I frequently rose in the morning without knowing whether I should taste a morsel all day; but God ordered it so, that sometimes when I could scarce bear the excess of hunger, some Indians, who were willing to divide their mouthful of cassabi with me, arrived."*

During the whole year he was occasionally visited by Warau Indians, which afforded him an opportunity of preaching the gospel to them; and this always animated him afresh to labour, in hopes of better times. Some of them also promised to come and live with him. In consequence of his incessant bodily labours, often beyond his strength, he was attacked with sickness, which was increased by the insalubrity of the climate and his mean and scanty fare. His fellow missionaries in Paramaribo, being informed of it, immediately despatched brother Boemper to his assistance. It was sometime before he could procure a conductor, for the Indians are in general afraid of going near a sick person, and had moreover been terrified by a report that the devil lived with Daehne. They, therefore, did all they could to dissuade brother Boemper from venturing to go to so dangerous a person. However, he at length prevailed, and arrived, to the great comfort of Daehne, whose health was soon restored.

Having spent nearly two years in this solitary abode, he was in 1759 relieved by three missionaries. These built a church and dwelling-house, and laid out plantations, giving the name of Ephrem to the new settlement. They diligently visited those Indians, who, after leaving Pilgerhut, had become residents in this part of the country; and some of them came to live in the settlement. Many Carribbees and Waraus also visited them; and they had the pleasure to observe that their testimony of Christ and his salvation evinced its divine power on the Indians, whose tears manifested the emotion of their hearts. This, amidst many external difficulties and hardships, encouraged them to labour in hope.

But their faith and patience were put to a fresh and severe trial. The rebellion of the Negro slaves in Berbice, in 1763, rendered the whole country along the banks of the Corentyn unsafe, and forced their converts to retire into the interior. After awaiting the issue for some time, the missionaries removed to Paramaribo, and their house was occupied by soldiers. The rebellion of the Negroes being suppressed in 1764, they returned to their post. They found their former dwelling nearly in ruins; and as the situation of Ephrem was very unhealthy, being frequently exposed to inundations, they abandoned that place, and moved about twelve miles higher up the river. Here they found a piece of land well suited for plantations, and a good house, which had been built for a magazine. This they purchased of government; and, after making some needful alterations, moved into it in 1765. Its situation being at no great distance from the river Mepenne, whither most of the Indian converts had fled during the disturbances, led them to hope that many of their scattered sheep would again be collected, and restored to the fold of the good Shepherd, and in this expectation they gave it the name of Hope.†

In process of time, many of those Indians who had been baptized by the Brethren, found their way to this new settlement. They erected huts for themselves, and at a convenient distance laid out their fields. Some of them had grown rather wild, yet the remembrance of the grace they had formerly enjoyed was not totally obliterated; and, being now revived by the instruction of the missionaries, a pleasing change was soon effected. The Brethren also neglected no opportunity of informing the other Indians of their residence in the country, and inviting them to come and hear the Word of God. They likewise paid occasional visits to the heathen, some of whom embraced the gospel and were added to the church. Thus the congregation at Hope continued for several years in a pleasing course; and though the increase in point of number was not considerable, yet the grace of God was often strikingly experienced. At the close of the year 1783, the number of Christian Indians belonging to the settlement amounted to one hundred and sixty-seven persons.

During subsequent years the prospect become rather discouraging. The naturally roving disposition of the Indians, which had always been a great impediment to the mission, gained fresh ascendancy. At one time no less than twenty men of the baptized left Hope, and removed to a considerable distance; and those who still remained spent most of their time in their planting-grounds, and were often four, eight, and even twelve weeks absent from church; nor was it always possible to visit them. This was injurious to their progress in Christian knowledge and practice; many, in fact, seemed to lose the little knowledge they had obtained, and sunk into a state of supineness and indifference to the gospel. Few of the heathen paid any regard to the instructions of the missionaries, and the Arawak nation was rapidly decreasing in number, many being carried off by the small-pox and other epidemical diseases.

This was the state of things at Hope in 1789, when brother John Jacob Gottlob Fischer arrived there. He appeared remarkably qualified to labour among a people like the Indians. Endowed with a vigorous constitution and an active and enterprising mind, improved by study, he was capable of enduring much bodily fatigue, and of devising and executing plans for the mental improvement of the converts. With astonishing facility he acquired, in a few months, sufficient knowledge of the Arawak language, to preach in public: and even earlier than this, he had commenced a school with the children, in which he taught reading and writing: and one of the boys in a short time made such progress, that he could be employed in copying, and could assist in teaching the rest. In a few weeks he had thirty scholars, who were eager to learn; and those parents who lived at a distance, permitted their children to remain in the settlement, that they might obtain instruction. The zeal with which he engaged in this and other schemes, animated the sinking courage of the other missionaries. He hoped by these means to infuse more steadiness and activity into the character of the Arawaks, thereby rendering them more susceptible of moral and intellectual improvement, and thus to facilitate their advancement in spiritual knowledge.

In order to induce the Christian Indians to forsake their roving dispositions, which they always excused by alleging the infertility of the soil on the Corentyn, Fischer went to a neighbouring chief on the Aulibissi Creek, where there was good planting-ground, to inquire whether he would permit the Indians of Hope to plant in his territory. He immediately consented, and pointing to a considerable tract of forest-land, said: "This land God has given to me, as he gave that of Hope to thee, and thus I am the rightful possessor of it. Now, as I have not created it, and thou canst use it, I freely deliver it over to thee; and thy people may come and clear it as soon as they please." He then, in very kind terms, addressed the Indians who accompanied brother Fischer, assuring them that no devil, or evil spirit, haunted the land. In consequence of these arrangements several families built huts in the settlement, so that in 1793 it contained one hundred and fifty-one inhabitants; besides whom about one hundred baptized Arawaks lived scattered in the vicinity. New life from God was also perceptible in the congregation.

As this appears to have been the most flourishing period in the mission at Hope; some remarks, may very properly be introduced in this place, on the settlement and improvement of its Indian inhabitants in the arts of civilized society. Brother Hans Wied, at that time superintendent of the South American mission, gives the following description of this place in the year 1794.

"Hope is situate on the left bank of the Corentyn, as you ascend from the sea. The opposite bank is high and sandy: but on this side the soil is loamy and not very fruitful. The woods, except where paths have been cut by the natives, are rendered almost impenetrable by an immense quantity of Busch-Tau. In the neighbourhood of the settlement the wood is cut down and rooted up; and plantations of coffee, bananas, and cotton, together with a considerable portion of pasture ground, amply reward the industry of the Christian Indians.

"The missionaries' dwelling stands about forty feet distant from the river, and the ascent to it is by a range of nineteen steps. It is built, partly in the Indian, and partly in the colonial style. Its front is of weather-boarding, and the two sides and back are constructed with a double row of palisades, placed close together. The partitions inside are made in the same manner, and every part covered with a plaster, made of chalk and charcoal, of a bluish hue. All the floors are made of clay, mixed with chalk. The rooms of the brethren Fischer and Loesche have ceilings of strong laths, lying horizontally; but the hall, which is spacious and serves for a dining-room, as also the church, which is comprised in the same building, have no covering except the roof. This is made, in the Indian manner, of large leaves fastened upon laths, and all the beams and rafters are secured by Busch-Tau. Behind the dwellings are the Negro-house, kitchen, store-house, and stables, so constructed that, in the rainy-season each may be approached under cover. Next to the mission-house, to the right, down the river, stands brother Voegtle's house, built by his own hands in the Indian manner, extremely neat and furnished with a gallery. About one hundred yards from the dwellings of the missionaries, on each side, most of the houses of the Indian brethren and sisters are ranged in regular rows, along the bank, so that the mission-house and church, which stands nearly in the middle, divide the settlement into two parts. Close to the houses on either side is a well made foot-path, leading to the woods. Some of the Indian houses are not built in the row, but in the gardens, and nearly hid among the fruit-trees. At the back of the settlement runs a fence, to prevent the cattle from entering the garden-grounds. The most considerable gardens belonging to the Indians, namely, their cassabi plantations, which afford them the chief part of their sustenance, are at Aulibissi, on the opposite side of the Corentyn, about an hour and a half's walk from Hope. The school is situated behind the mission-house, and is an airy Indian building.

"The employment of the Christian Indians at Hope consists chiefly in cultivating their fields and gardens, in weaving mats, and in cutting and preparing timber. One or two of the missionaries accompany them into the wood, where they fell trees, cut planks, and make shingles. A large quantity of the latter, as likewise many bundles of hammocks made by them, are sold at Berbice, and the produce applied towards the purchase of necessaries for themselves and their families. They are thus constantly kept in a state of useful industry."*

Goods cannot be conveyed to Berbice in any other way than by water, and as the missionaries for a long time could not afford to have a large vessel, they frequently ran great risks with their small canoes or coryars. At length they purchased a large boat, in which the brethren Fischer and Kluge, and four Indians, set out for Berbice in August 1795, but the voyage proved very unsuccessful. Having proceeded a considerable way, the boat, all of a sudden, became leaky, and the water gained upon them so fast, that she sunk before they could run her aground. They first clung to a cask fastened to the boat, and then to the mast, part of which was above water; and thus remained eight hours exposed to the most imminent danger in the open sea, till after midnight they succeeded in getting on shore, by means of a small coryar; and reached Hope in safety. Meanwhile the Indians continued their exertions with undiminished diligence, and prepared other articles to send to Berbice, in which they were assisted by a German called Vogt, whom the missionaries engaged for that purpose, and with whose conduct and diligence they had every reason to be satisfied.

Besides the daily school for the children, they began in 1796 a Sunday school for adults. Sixty men and women attended at the opening of it, and showed great diligence and eagerness to learn.

Hope being situated on the frontiers between Surinam and Berbice, was exposed to many difficulties, in consequence of the war between Holland and Great Britain, the latter having taken possession of Berbice in 1796. Brother Kluge, returning from Paramaribo in their own vessel, laden with provisions, was captured by an English privateer, and plundered of all the stores. The privateer carried him and his Indians to Berbice, where he was taken very ill; but by the kind attention of some friends, with whom he lodged, he soon recovered; and, after paying a considerable sum to ransom the vessel, returned to Hope. In the sequel the English treated the missionaries with great civility, permitting them to continue their voyages from one colony to the other without interruption.

Shortly before the British had possessed themselves of Demarary, a circumstance occurred peculiarly trying to the Indian congregation. A gang of run-away Negroes commenced a rebellion in that colony, and committed the most horrid murders and outrages. The Dutch government having resolved to quell this insurrection by means of Indian auxiliaries, the governor wrote a letter to the missionaries at Hope, desiring them to exhort their Indians to join the rest of their nation and the military, in the expedition against the Negroes. They convened the congregation and communicated the governor's letter, but, as they were acknowledged an independent people, they left them to their own free will as to the steps they would choose to take. The Indians hereupon held a council, the result of which was, that they declared they had no mind to join in the war against the Negroes, especially as their own country would be left exposed if they were all to march off into a distant part; but if Berbice were attacked, they should then think themselves bound to oppose the incursion of the enemy. This resolution they sent to the post at Auleara; but were answered, that it could not be considered as their own act and deed, because they depended on the will of their teachers, and would surely go, if the latter advised them to it. The Indians were indeed watching the missionaries, and expected to have a decisive opinion from them; but they carefully avoided any interference, and daily offered up prayer and supplication, that the Lord would avert the storm. Upwards of twenty of the men having returned from their work in the wood, another council was held, during which the women stood without and wept. The result was, that three of them agreed to go to the war. As the European officers had reckoned upon fifty warriors from Hope, they were greatly disappointed at seeing only three arrive; and several of them, and also some parties of Indians, came to Hope and made some disturbance. However they did not succeed in their endeavours, for not one more would join them. On the 23d of July the warriors passed by in two canoes; one carrying twenty and the other thirty-four men. The missionaries then reported the whole transaction to the governor, and he expressed himself perfectly satisfied with their conduct. In about two months the Indians returned, having stormed a camp of four hundred rebel Negroes, and either killed or dispersed them. Many Demarary Indians and soldiers were killed, but none of this country.

Amidst these outward perplexities the missionaries had cause to rejoice at the success which attended their labours in the gospel. The congregation at Hope, which hitherto had been chiefly collected from the Arawaks, now began to obtain an increase from another tribe called Waraus.

The character of this tribe is marked by a greater degree of levity than that of the other Indians in Guiana. Their habits are more depraved and dissolute. They are more addicted to stealing, excessively superstitious and indolent. Their mental capacities appear less than those of other Indians; and though, by living among the Arawaks and understanding their language, they had had frequent opportunities of hearing the gospel, yet they paid little attention to it, but seemed less fit for the kingdom of God than the former. The greater, therefore, did the power of the gospel appear in the awakening and conversion of some of this tribe. Thirty-six became inhabitants of Hope in the year 1796.

An epidemical disease prevailing about this time, many heathen came to Hope to consult the missionaries. These gladly gave them the best advice and assistance in their power, and improved these visits for commending to them the gospel, as the most effectual antidote against the fear of death. It was gratifying to them to observe the beneficial influence of religion on their converts in this season of affliction, not only as it appeared in the tranquil state of their minds, but as it meliorated their temporal condition; for they enjoyed much better care and attendance in sickness than the heathen; and it was ascertained by indubitable facts, that in epidemical diseases eight heathen died for one Christian Indian.

During the years 1797 and 1798 they had to encounter various difficulties. A scarcity, little short of real famine, afflicted the country. A prodigious swarm of large ants having nearly destroyed their plantations, the missionaries were obliged every day to seek, and almost beg, their morsel of cassabi, and after all to pay an enormous price for it. They were in total want both of bread and meal, as well as meat and butter, and no game could be obtained. This distress was afterwards lessened, as government permitted them to travel to Berbice on concerns of the mission.

* Per. Acct. Vol. I. p. 419.

While this scarcity continued, several alarming reports were circulated of hostilities having commenced among some of the Indian tribes. In consequence of these rumours many Arawaks and Waraus left their habitations, and fled for safety to the settlement at Hope, bringing their goods with them. All the Indians on the other side of the Corentyn fled, and mostly took refuge with our brethren. Even those at the post, who were stationed there for the defence of the country, came to the settlement. To inspire the people with some degree of courage, the missionaries dispersed all the men, who had arms, in regular bands, to keep watch, and to prevent any one escaping; and all the coryars, or boats, were brought on land. Thus, at the beginning of 1797, there were upwards of two hundred fugitives in the settlement. Many of them cleared ground for building and planting in the vicinity. In a few months, however, tranquillity was restored, and they again quitted that part of the country, without having received any apparent benefit from their intercourse with the Christian Indians.

But now a disaster of a far more distressing nature befel the mission. In March 1798 a ship was wrecked near the mouth of the Corentyn. The captain and another gentleman, who gave themselves out to be Americans, came to Hope. The missionaries immediately sent intelligence of this to the postmaster of Auleara, who, after examining into the business, permitted them to convoy these gentlemen to Berbice, whither they were bound. The day after, therefore, brother Fischer set out with them, and the next morning came up with the crew, belonging to the wrecked vessel. Fischer, having taken an inventory of the goods saved from the ship, returned to Hope; and the unfortunate company, consisting of twenty-four persons, pursued their voyage to Berbice in one of their own sloops and in the barge belonging to the mission, being accompanied by seven Indians. It was now discovered that they were not Americans, but English. In consequence of this the postmaster of Nieukeur was obliged to go to Paramaribo, whither brother Kluge accompanied him, to lay a circumstantial account of the whole occurrence before government. A fortnight after Adjutant General Roux arrived at the settlement, to examine into the affair. After his return to Paramaribo, an order was sent from government requiring that Fischer and his family should immediately leave the country. This was a most afflictive dispensation, both to the missionaries and their converts, who came in crowds to lament the removal of this useful man from the mission. However, as suspicions were entertained that, on discovering that the pretended Americans were British subjects, Fischer had assisted in secreting part of the cargo of the stranded ship, which according to the laws of war belonged to the government, our brethren viewed it as a special favour, that this occurrence did not lessen the benevolence of the governor for them and their establishment, and that he continued to them the permission formerly granted, of carrying their goods for sale to Berbice.

The number of inhabitants at Hope was in the meantime considerably increased. At the close of 1799 it amounted to near three hundred persons; and besides them, there were many others, who were benefitted by the ministry of our brethren, though they still lived scattered in the woods. But in the following years the number was greatly diminished, many being carried off by the small-pox, and others, yielding to their naturally roving disposition, retreated for some time to Aporocreek, so that at the end of 1801, only one hundred and forty-six persons resided at Hope, and one hundred and seventeen baptized Indians were living dispersed in the country.

In August, 1806, Hope was visited by a dreadful calamity. One afternoon, while the missionaries were setting together taking some refreshment, a fire broke out, which ran with such rapidity along the thatched roofs of the houses, that in a short time every building in the settlement, not excepting the church and the mission-house, became a prey to the flames. Only the walls of the church, which were made of planks, remained in part standing, but all the tools, and implements of gardening and husbandry, together with the tackle and rigging of their boat, the stores of the Indians, and various other articles and provisions, were consumed. Fortunately, however, they saved their books and manuscripts, most of their clothes, and some gun-powder and two barrels of flour. And no one received any personal injury. This calamity was rendered still more distressing, as there was reason to suspect that the fire had been kindled by incendiaries. Several attempts of the same kind had been made the preceding days, but being timely discovered, the design had been frustrated.

About two years after, the missionaries were under the necessity of quitting Hope. Most, if not all, of those Indians belonging to that congregation, who were truly converted in heart, and walked worthily of the gospel, were by means of an epidemical disorder, in a short period of time, called into eternity, and departed this life rejoicing in their Redeemer. None, therefore, were left, who by their example led the rest to serious reflection, or, at least, to orderly behaviour; but a spirit of resistance and enmity to the gospel became predominant.

This suspension of the mission on the Corentyn having occasioned deep regret in all our congregations in Europe, the brethren in Paramaribo were commissioned to avail themselves of the first opportunity that might offer, to collect the scattered remains of the Arawak flock, and to endeavour to renew the mission. Several of the Indians themselves, who occasionally came to Paramaribo, expressed a wish that the labours of the brethren among their nation might be renewed; and declared that many of those who, by their dissolute and refractory conduct, had contributed to the dispersion of the congregation, repented of what they had done, and would now put a higher value upon the instruction given them, if the mission were re-established.

As soon, therefore, as it was practicable, brother Langballe and his wife paid a visit to the Indians in those parts. They found the former settlement at Hope quite forsaken, and overgrown with bushes. About three miles higher up, on the Berbice side of the river, they met with a considerable number of baptized Indians, who formerly lived at Hope, and had made a settlement there. They were received by them with great cordiality, and staid with them three weeks. Every day brother Langballe held a meeting, and spoke with them on the necessity of faith in Christ and true conversion. They listened with great attention and apparent devotion to his discourses; several of them expressed their sorrow at having no teacher now residing amongst them, and their earnest desire, not only to be favoured again with opportunities of hearing the Word of God, but to live in conformity to it. Brother Langballe at that time could do no more than make a regulation among them to meet together and read the New Testament. He encouraged them to turn anew with their whole heart to Jesus, and to forsake all heathenish practices, and help to build each other up in the faith. He and his wife then visited the other baptized, who lived dispersed on the Ziporotu and Mepenne rivers. Many of these poor people bewailed the loss of their teachers, and expressed their sincere wish that missionaries might again come and dwell among them. According to the best information brother Langballe could procure from those whom he visited, he found that of the former inhabitants of Hope, one hundred and ninety-seven persons were still living. He himself had spoken with seventy-seven of the baptized.

Encouraged by these promising appearances, two missionaries, William Christian Genth and John Hafa, who had lately arrived in Surinam, proceeded, in June 1812, to the Corentyn, where they found a house ready for them, having been built, in expectation of their arrival, by one of the Christian Indians. It was about three miles distant from the seite of the old settlement. With the assistance of some Negroes they had brought with them from Paramaribo, they soon cleared a piece of ground for planting, and enlarged their dwelling, so as to accommodate the Indians with a meeting-room. Thirty of the baptized resided about a mile from them, and diligently attended divine worship. In process of time two or three Indian families came to settle with them, and others promised to follow; but that awakening and true conversion of the heart, which the Spirit of God alone can effect, were still wanting.

Their labours remaining unproductive of fruit, the missionaries left the station on the Corentyn, and removed to the river Neukeer, there to preach the gospel to the Negroes on the neighbouring plantations, being followed by five converted Arawak Indians. Brother Genth fixed his residence on an estate called Good Intent, about four miles from the river; the proprietor provided him with a dwelling-house and a garden, and a building to serve for a meeting-house. This place lies in the centre of eight cotton plantations, from which the Negroes were allowed to attend divine service without molestation. Brother Hafa settled on another estate near the coast, on the river Copaname. This was the state of things in 1817.

SECTION IV.

Bambey on the Surinam.

The government at Surinam having in the year 1761 made peace with the free Negroes, living on the river Surinam, and wisely judging that their conversion to Christianity would, more than any thing else, tend to make them peaceable, and put a stop to those depredations and cruelties which they had formerly committed, made application to the Brethren to send missionaries to instruct them. In consequence of this application, the Brethren, in the year 1765, sent the missionaries Lewis Christopher Daehne, Rudolph Stoll, and Thomas Jones to Paramaribo; who set out from thence for Sara Creek, on December 7th. Their goods had been previously conveyed up the river by a boat carrying soldiers, and they themselves arrived there on the 12th.

About the same time Mr. Doehring had been sent by government as agent to the free Negroes, to distribute presents among them, and do every thing in his power to engage their friendship. He was likewise commissioned to introduce the missionaries to the chiefs, and to recommend them to their favour. In this view he invited all the chiefs to a conversation in his tent. A good many free Negroes came with them, to whom Mr. Doehring presented the above mentioned brethren, informing them of the purport of their coming, namely, to make them acquainted with God their Creator and Saviour; and added "Whatever you do to these men, whether good or bad, I shall consider as done to myself." The Negroes unanimeusly promised to treat them in the best manner.

The missionaries intended to travel further into the country, but as the Negroes had not room in their boats for the accommodation of all, brother Stoll was obliged to return, with part of the baggage, to Victoria, and wait for another opportunity. This separation gave them much concern. However, as no plan could be devised, the brethren Daehne and Jones went with the Negroes, and arrived December 21th; the former on the Senthea Creek, with Abini (father to John Arabini who became a worthy member of the congregation at Bambey), and the latter with Samsam on Doose Creek. It was by no means their wish to reside at two different places, but Samsam, who was a chief, and with whom brother Jones had travelled, kept him by force. This did not arise from particular regard, or attachment, to the missionary, but solely from ambition, that he might likewise have an European residing with him, which the Negroes esteem an honour. January 1st, 1766, however, brother Jones found an opportunity of disengaging himself from his ungracious host, and rejoining his fellow missionary, Daehne, on the Senthea Creek. Samsam continued for some time to be very troublesome, by insisting on having one of them as a resident in his house; and when he found them resolute in their determination of dwelling together, kept back their goods, and either applied them to his own use, or suffered them to spoil. They felt their loss very severely. However, on the 2d of February brother Stoll arrived from Victoria with the remainder of their baggage.

The meeting of all appointed to the same work gave them great joy; but, it was soon turned into grief, by the unexpected departure of brother Jones into eternal rest, on the 7th of the same month. The two remaining brethren at first suffered great hardships and poverty, and lived in a small miserable hut, near the dwelling of two old Negroes, till Abini, becoming sensible of their distress, built a small house for them. In a short time, however, they lost likewise this friend and benefactor. He was shot in a battle between the combined force of the Saramacca Negroes and the white people and Matuari Negroes. Before he went to the battle, he is said to have presented his son, John Arabini, to the missionaries, with words to the following effect: "that he did not know what sort of people the Brethren were, nor the cause of their abode in the country, but believed God had sent them."

In August the same year Cujo, afterwards called Joshua, brought his son Scipio to brother Stoll, and requested him to teach him to read and write. With this boy the missionaries began a school, which was afterwards increased by some other young people; but only two stayed, and at their pressing request went in the sequel to reside with the missionaries, and, having received a real sense of the love of God in their souls, were baptized and admitted to the holy sacrament.

Arabini, who was chosen chief in the place of his father, proved a real friend and protector to the missionaries. Having, in the course of a year, acquired sufficient knowledge of the language to render themselves intelligible to the inhabitants of the village, they informed them of their reason for coming to the country, namely, to make them acquainted with the true God, the Creator and Redeemer of man. This excited the jealousy and opposition of the idol-priests, and especially of the old women, who terrified their superstitious countrymen by representing to them that their gados (or gods) were angry with them for turning to the Gran-gado (the great God) of the white people. Not satisfied with thus deterring the Negroes from having any intercourse with the missionaries, they even plotted their destruction. But as they were ignorant of their murderous design, they continued to hold their family devotions with their doors open, hoping that some of the savages might be attracted by curiosity to attend. They were, however, warned against going out of the house at night, and they themselves make the following remark in their report of 1767: "Our situation is even more dangerous than we are aware of; but we depend on him who is the sure defence of his servants, and is mightier than all. If it please him, we are willing to be made a sacrifice. May he only preserve to us the feeling of his peace." But as Arabini maintained a good understanding with the Dutch government, who had recommended the missionaries to his protection, none of their enemies ventured to do them any personal injury.

Brother Daehne having returned to Europe in 1768, the service of the mission devolved upon Stoll, the missionary sent to his assistance being confined by illness for a whole year. As no entrance could be gained among the adults, brother Stoll continued the school with the children, and for their use translated select portions of the New Testament. He had the pleasure to observe that his labours were not altogether lost on their juvenile minds.

The missionaries had hitherto resided in a Negro village on Senthea creek, where their situation was often rendered extremely unpleasant, by the wild and rude behaviour of the inhabitants, who frequently spent whole weeks in rioting and drunkenness, especially when there was a sacrificial feast or a funeral. They, therefore, did not regret the removal of most of the Negroes to Sebonne creek. Thither they followed them, and settled on a small piece of land, procured by Arabini, at a short distance from the village. Arabini also built a house for them, which they inhabited in February, 1769, and from the great number of bamboo canes growing there, called their settlement Quama. The same year brother Kersten and his wife arrived from Europe to serve in this mission. They indulged the hope that the services of a sister would be of essential benefit, as the brethren, owing to the influence of Arabini's grand-mother, could gain no access to the Negro women. This idolatrous old woman, whose opinions were venerated as of divine inspiration, was a sworn enemy to the mission.

Among the adults, Arabini was hitherto the only one on whose mind the testimony of the gospel made any visible impression. Notwithstanding his being exposed to constant ridicule and opposition, he continued to protect and befriend the missionaries, and as he boldly avowed his sentiments respecting the doctrines of the gospel, others were induced to go and hear for themselves. Thus in May, 1770, a considerable number of men attended the preaching, listened to the discourse with great silence and apparent devotion, and even came again in the evening, requesting to hear more of the word of God. In the sequel, also, there was no want of hearers, though as yet none of the women ventured to come, being afraid of exasperating their gods by their attendance. Though the impression made upon their hearers could scarce be considered as a real awakening, yet it greatly encouraged the missionaries to persevere in their labours of love.

While most of their hearers received the seed on stony ground, or among thorns, or by the way-side, it fell, in the case of Arabini, on good ground. This man evidently increased in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, and boldly confessed the doctrine of the gospel. The missionaries, therefore, felt no hesitation in admitting him to holy baptism. This sacred rite was performed on the 6th of January, 1771, in presence of most of the male inhabitants of the village. The missionaries viewed it as an auspicious circumstance, that the most respectable chief of the nation was the first who became obedient to the gospel, hoping that his public profession of Christianity would produce a salutary effect on his countrymen. In this, however, they were disappointed. His baptism mightily incensed the heathen, especially the idolatrous women, and they opposed the effects. likely to result from this occurrence with a zeal worthy of a better cause. Instigated by them, the captain of a neighbouring village, foaming with rage, and armed with a gun and sabre, entered the mission-house, sharply reprehending the missionaries for committing the heinous offence of persuading Arabini to forsake the gods of his ancestors, and turn to the God of the white people. But their undaunted confession of the truth and the testimony of Arabini himself concerning the blessed change wrought in him, subdued the fury of the captain, and he calmly returned to his own house.

Arabini remained faithful to his profession, and, being much respected as the chief of the nation, often prevented disorders and mischief, and averted harm from the missionaries. They esteemed him as a faithful follower of Christ, and appointed him as an assistant in preaching the gospel to his countrymen. This office he discharged with zeal and activity.* The impression made on the rest of their hearers was very transient. Hitherto they had performed divine service in their own house, but in 1772 they built a chapel. As they could get but very little assistance from the Negroes, they were obliged to do most of the work themselves. Brother Kersten, in his report, makes the following just remark: "A missionary ought to understand something of several arts and trades. Though we are but two, it is well for us that we can make a shift to do a little of the work of a tailor, shoemaker, carpenter, farmer, basket-maker and smith, and besides preaching the gospel to the Negroes, can even serve them as physicians and surgeons."

In 1773 the Negroes, from superstitious motives and love of change, left Quama; and the missionaries were obliged to follow them lower down the river to the little Quaffa-dam. They called their new residence Bambey, which, in the language of the country, signifies only wait, or have patience. By giving it this name they intended to remind each other, that the gospel ought to be preached with patience and perseverance, and in confident expectation of the help of the Lord. The constant recollection of this was peculiarly necessary at this time, as their situation was by no means encouraging. In 1773 only one Negro was baptized, and the addition to their congregation, two years after, amounted but to three. Several missionaries, who came to assist in the work, departed this life shortly after their arrival; and in 1777 brother Rudolph Stoll likewise fell asleep in Jesus. The removal of this worthy and zealous servant of Christ was felt as a severe affliction by the free Negroes, among whom, to this day, he is held in respectful remembrance. He had served this mission, amidst many difficulties and hardships, for more than eleven years.

He was succeeded at Bambey by brother Christopher Lewis Schuman. Being, in consequence of the death of his assistant, soon left alone, and having suffered much from severe illnesses, he was obliged to return to Paramaribo. His successor, brother Hans and his wife were both called away from this stage of life, in about a month after their arrival, and within six days of each other. After a vacancy at Bambey of five months, brother Schuman returned. In subsequent years sickness and the death of several missionaries occasioned continual changes; but the Negroes were always thankful when a new missionary arrived.

The year 1780 was distinguished by some encouraging events. The number of believing free Negroes amounted as yet to only seven men, for hitherto the women had not only refused to listen to the gospel, but opposed the conversion of the men by all the arts in their power; but this year three adult women were baptized, one of whom was the wife of Arabini, and besides them three men and two children.

The most animating to the missionaries, on these occasions, was the change wrought in the sentiments of the heathen. They remark concerning this: "After the baptism of Arabini, the Negroes by their very looks menaced us with destruction; but now they appear affected, their superstitious notions are shaken, and they allow, that those who are baptized, are delivered from the foolish dread of their gados."

Arabini greatly facilitated their labours by his zealous endeavours to awaken the attention of his countrymen to the things belonging to their peace. After one of the missionaries had delivered a disclosure, he generally added a short exhortation of his own, expressed in a manner well calculated to arrest the attention of his countrymen. Once he addressed them thus: "You acknowledge me for your chief, and therefore ask my advice in all important concerns, and I freely tell you my mind. You know I have often told you how good it is to live in peace with the white people, and that it is not good if it be broken through our fault. But when I tell you that you wage war against him who has made you and the whole world, and who, out of love to us, has come down from heaven to redeem us from all iniquity by his own blood and death, you pay little attention to my discourse. God hath sent teachers to make these things known to us: I beseech you, reflect seriously on these great truths." On another occasion, when the subject of the sermon had been the final judgment, Arabini overhearing some of the heathen converse together and remarking, that then they would hide in the wood, or kill themselves, stepped forward and thus addressed them: "The Lord will know where to find you, even those who have died many years ago; all, all must appear before him; and those, who have loved him in this world, he will bring with him into eternal joy, but all the rest he will consign to the torments of everlasting fire." Some replied, that as so many would share in the punishment, it would not be so severe to each individual. Arabini shrewdly answered: "Try the experiment, and all of you put your fingers together into the fire, let us see whether each individual will not feel the same degree of pain as if he were alone." Struck dumb by this remark, the whole assembly broke up with a heavy sigh.

In 1785 the Negroes again changed their place of abode, and moved further down the river to the mouth of the Wana creek; whither the missionaries followed them the next year. They called this place New Bambey.

Amidst many difficulties they continued their labours on this new station with persevering zeal. They made occasional visits to the neighbouring villages, sowing the seed of the word in faith, and in hope that God would at some future period give the desired increase. The progress of their few converts in evangelical knowledge and Christian practice was slow, and often impeded by the many temptations which were daily thrown in their way. Though the missionaries in a considerable degree succeeded to wean them from the lying vanities of their former lives, yet these were so deeply rooted in their hearts, that wholly to eradicate them required constant care and vigilance. Here again Arabini's firm and decided opposition to every thing of a superstitious nature was of great use. On the death of one of his relations, who had been a zealous idol-priestess, he gave strict orders that no pagan rites should be performed at her funeral. The heathen, however, availing themselves of his absence, pretended that the deceased was unwilling to be removed, and it was necessary, first, to inquire who had been the cause of her death. They were proceeding to institute this inquiry, when Arabini arrived, and, by laying hold of the bier himself, convinced the heathen that the corpse could be removed, and thus confounded the sorcerers. This was a most fortunate circumstance, for their custom on such occasions is shocking to humanity. The sorcerers pretend they have discovered the murderer, and, fixing on some miserable wretch, apply the most cruel tortures to extort a confession of the alleged crime from him, and then put him to death in a most barbarous manner.

By degrees, however, the savages themselves became ashamed of this superstitious and cruel practice. In 1791 a woman pretended that she had repeatedly dreamed that a man came to her with a fire-brand in his hand, which she interpreted as a sure indication that he was a sorcerer and poison-mixer, and consequently ought to be burned. A council was convened to decide the fate of this unfortunate man. Arabini, (who, as captain of the village, presided at this consultation,) with the unanimous approbation of all the counsellors, declared: "They could pay no attention to such absurdities, and, if no other evidence of the guilt of the accused person could be adduced than foolish dreams, no one should dare to do him the least injury." Upon the whole, the pagan inhabitants of the village, though they showed no disposition to be converted, laid no further impediments in the way of their believing countrymen, but evinced a spirit of toleration and liberality, when preparing for any religious solemnity, and were even ready to assist them. They, however, expected the same liberality from the Christian Negroes, and expressed displeasure when they refused to assist them in their idolatrous festivities."

* The following anecdote shows the power of conviction on the mind of Arabini, at an early period. Soon after the arrival of the missionaries in the country, and before he had avowed himself a convert to Christianity, having often heard them declare that the idols of the heathen could neither help nor hurt them, he went one morning to the river where the crocodile, or alligator, who was the god of the village, had his haunt. On seeing the creature, he addressed it thus, (holding his loaded gun in his hand:) "I intend to shoot thee. Now, if thou art a God, my bullet will do thee no harm; but if thou art a creature, it will kill thee." He then fired his piece and shot the animal dead. Alarmed at this, the idol-priestesses sacrificed a cock to appease the wrath of the pretended deity.—Per. Acct. Vol. II. p. 96.

In subsequent years the prospect became more exhilarating. The missionary Wiez, in a letter, dated May, 1793, writes: "We enjoy many happy days with our small congregation of believing free Negroes. Our Saviour leads them to more steadfast faith in his precious atonement, and grants them a gradual increase in the knowledge of themselves and of his great love to sinners. By means of the conversations of the Christian free Negroes, who are stirred up to declare the truth to their countrymen, the gospel spreads more and more in the upper country, or highlands. Two heathen from those parts have been baptized." A man, who at his baptism was called Paul, evinced particular zeal. He had formerly been a zealous idolator, and had never resided with the missionaries. Yet it was chiefly by his means that the awakening in the highlands commenced; and it was at his house that those who desired instruction used to meet for religious exercise and edification.

The missionaries also made frequent excursions to the highlands, and found many attentive hearers in every village where they preached. They remarked it as a singular fact, that in those villages, where the heathen sorcerers had formerly had the greatest influence, the gospel now appeared to make the deepest impression. Many of the highlanders expressed a wish, that some of the brethren would settle among them, and a spot of ground was chosen for the building of a house and chapel. This, however, could not be executed. Frequently there was only one missionary at New Bambey, who consequently could not be absent; and the roving disposition of the free Negroes, who are never long stationary in one place, threw insurmountable obstacles in the way of its execution. For no European constitution can bear the excessive fatigue and other hardships unavoidably connected with moving to and fro through the forest. Many valuable lives of missionaries have formerly been sacrificed in the attempt.

The missionaries, therefore, were obliged to content themselves with occasional visits to the highlands. These visits were for some years chiefly undertaken by three of the native assistants, who were much better able to endure the difficulties of these journeys than Europeans. Their simple, but zealous testimony of Jesus and his atonement found ready entrance in several places, and led to true conversion of heart. Thus, when a missionary could pay a visit in those parts, he found the way in a great measure prepared. He was not only welcomed with joy by the free Negroes, who came in numbers to hear him, and often, after listening for nearly two hours to a sermon, would request him to continue his discourse; but also discovered in some of them such evident signs of repentance and change of mind, that he felt no hesitation in admitting them to holy baptism.

In 1793 a death occurred at New Bambey, the attending circumstances of which made a salutary impression upon the minds of the inhabitants, especially the young people. Brother Wiez gives the following account of it: "August 30th the Negro Cornelius, who had been out hunting, was brought home very ill. He was yesterday bitten in the leg by a rattle-snake and suffered very great pain, the swelling having spread above the hip. In the following days the poison spread further, and the offensive smell, occasioned by its effects, rendered it very unpleasant to be with him. September 16th, being in great torment, both of body and mind, he sent for me. He seized my hand with eagerness, and held me fast; confessed that ever since his baptism he had frequently committed sin, and declared that he now felt forsaken of God, and expected soon to be cast into everlasting darkness.

"His parents and younger brother, who were baptized, and the former assistants in the mission, were present and exceedingly affected. I encouraged the patient to turn with confidence to Jesus, our compassionate Saviour, who had received gifts for man, yea for the rebellious also. But he refused comfort, and without reserve accused himself before all who visited him, as a miserable, perishing sinner, adding, that the Lord would not now receive him, as he had behaved too wickedly.

"On the 18th he again sent for me. He was in the same state of despondency, and entreated me, and the Negroes present, to pray for him, that he might receive mercy, which we did, kneeling round his bed; and he himself prayed most fervently and incessantly. When I visited him the day following he received me with joy, and said that he had obtained forgiveness of his sins, and felt the peace of God in his heart; and that he now greatly desired soon to depart and be with Christ. He then addressed the company present to the following effect: "Ah! my friends, abide in Jesus; give him your whole heart; and do not turn again to the ways of sin; look at me and consider how things have gone with me! I am a great sinner, but I have obtained mercy and pardon! yea, most assuredly every thing has been forgiven me; I have obtained mercy! Ah! join me to praise and thank our Saviour!" On the 26th he departed this life rejoicing.

"This man was the eldest son of our assistant Andrew, and was under strong convictions when a boy. The best hopes were entertained of his prosperity, and, in 1784, he was admitted to the class of candidates for baptism. However, he deviated from the path of truth, and got entangled in the snares of sin. God then made use of various extraordinary means to bring him to reflection. Once, when fishing, he was bitten by a poisonous fish, and it was with difficulty that his life was preserved. He showed signs of repentance, for a season, which, however, did not last. Some time after he was attacked and bit by a wild-boar, and again lay dangerously ill. He then confessed it to be a chastisement for his unfaithfulness, and seemed disposed to forsake his heathenish connexions, and turn with his whole heart to the Lord. But, alas! by degrees his good resolutions again vanished. Last year, when hunting in the woods, a tyger sprang upon him and tore him in a shocking manner. He now was brought to more solid reflection, and expressed a great desire to be truly converted. January 6th he was baptized, and for a short time appeared to be seriously awakened. Yet he did not remain faithful to the grace received, but seemed gradually relapsing into his former habits. When, therefore, the above mentioned accident happened, he immediately cried out: 'This is of God, and a just judgment, which will cost me my life.' "*

Besides attending to their regular occupation of preaching, keeping school, and instructing their converts more fully in the way of the Lord, the missionaries were diligently employed in translating. Wiez revised the translation of the four gospels, to which he added a version of the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles, and revised and enlarged the hymn-book in use among them. And, though the increase of their congregation was not rapid, yet they had frequently a considerable number of hearers, and no year elapsed without the admission of one or more heathen to baptism. From the commencement of the mission in 1771, to the end of the eighteenth century, fifty-nine heathen had been baptized, of whom seventeen had died in the faith; there were then forty-nine persons belonging to the congregation.

For several succeeding years no material change took place in the affairs of this mission, but in 1810 dark and heavy clouds seemed to rise in that quarter, and even to threaten the extinction of the light of the gospel. The missionaries remark: "If ever the power of Satan was any where manifest, it is among the free Negroes at Bambey. He exerts it by a host of diabolical emissaries, by sorcerers and old witches, with their lying fables and predictions, and by other heathen, who, having been excited to enmity against the government, seem determined to expel the missionaries from the country, because they are appointed to transact affairs between the Negroes and government. If it thereby becomes necessary to give up this agency, by which the station has hitherto been maintained, we cannot much longer support a mission in this wild country. The rebellious spirit, now prevailing among the free Negroes, has also more or less influence upon our small flock of Christian Negroes, and we can find but few, and those chiefly among the old people, who are to be depended upon as sincere and faithful to their convictions. John Arabini finds his influence and authority as captain inadequate to resist the overwhelming torrent of wickedness and rage of the enemy. Nothing but Almighty power can do this, and overcome and cast out Satan."†

This wild and ungovernable spirit began afterwards gradually to abate, and the baptized became sensible of the loss they would have sustained, if things had proceeded so far as to oblige their teachers to leave them. Several came and penitently owned their defection, expressing a sincere wish to be again restored to true spiritual life. The missionaries, therefore, took fresh courage, and, trusting in the grace and support of our Almighty Saviour, resolved still to hold out at their difficult post, and brother Maehr and his wife being left alone at Bambey, he resigned the office of agent for the government among the free Negroes. Hereby the maintenance of that station became more difficult, and, without the prospect of much eventual success, greatly increased the general expense of the missions; and as brother Maehr's wife suffered much from illness, and no assistance could, under existing circumstances, be speedily expected from Europe, it became necessary to suspend the mission in this quarter, at least for some time.

Of all the stations occupied by our missionaries in South America, this may be justly deemed the most difficult. The roving disposition of the free Negroes, and their superstitious and idolatrous habits, militated most strongly against the success of the gospel. And the unhealthiness of the climate was a constant source of severe trials to the missionaries. They were not only frequently confined by sickness, but many departed this life almost as soon as they had arrived. Those, who survived the seasoning fever, were often debilitated in their constitution, and seldom could hold out many years, without occasional visits to Europe or North America to recruit their health. These frequent changes, besides other disadvantages, were attended with this, that but few of the missionaries acquired a competent knowledge of the Saramacca language.

To the hardships, connected with the situation of the missionaries at Bambey, must likewise be reckoned the difficulty of conveying provisions and other necessary articles from Paramaribo. The boats which brought them were frequently upset and the whole cargo lost, by which the missionaries suffered very serious privations for many weeks. Equal difficulties, and even dangers, attended their voyages to this unfrequented and sequestered spot, which, lying in the midst of a horrid wilderness, is almost secluded from any intercourse with European settlements. The reader may form some idea of the toils and perils of such a voyage, by the following extracts, copied from the journal of two of the missionaries, travelling from Paramaribo to Bambey in September 1797.

After briefly narrating the events of their voyage up the river, till they had reached the last European plantation, brother Langballe, the writer of the journal, thus proceeds: "We now with good courage and fine weather prepared to encounter the difficulties before us in the wilderness. Having turned the point of a large island, the whole breadth of the first cataract, called Kanwatra, opened to our view. Although it cannot be reckoned among the largest in the world, yet a person unaccustomed to such a sight, is seized with sudden surprise and shuddering, in making up against an immense fall of water, three hundred paces in breadth, and rushing over huge stones. We kept as close as possible to the left bank, where the stream was so rapid, that though eight Negroes pulled with all their might, the coryar* often stood still, and they were obliged to get into the water and drag it forward with their hands. Having reached a little cove, they landed to recruit their strength before they proceeded up the cataract. This can only be done by keeping close under the brushwood near the shore, and by managing the boat with the greatest care and exertion. About five we gained the top of the first cataract, and soon arrived at the foot of the second, called Alisu Banja, which has steeper falls or steps than Kamwatra, and is consequently more dangerous to pass. As it was too late to venture on this work to-day, our Negroes landed and found some old huts, where we resolved to take up our night's lodging. These huts were open on all sides, with a flat roof made of palm-leaves. We made a fire before our hut, and prepared our supper of some victuals we had brought from Paramaribo, and, as it was the third day since we had taken any thing warm, it proved the more relishing.

"At six o'clock the next morning we left our safe cove to ascend the cataract. As we would not venture into the boat, the Negro boy Joseph attended us with an axe, and we proceeded by land, cutting our way through the wood. About eight we reached the great cataract, Kapassi Creh. The noise of its fall was so loud that we could not hear our own voices; and the agitation of the waters, occasioned by the rushing of the torrent over huge stones, is perceived at a great distance. We again ascended through the woods, leaving the Negroes to force the boat along. The river is very broad here; but in every direction full of rocks. About noon we passed a small cataract, Allutta Ganse, and at two o'clock another, called Lokusse. We also ran upon one of the many low rocks which lie concealed under the water; but, by God's mercy, received no injury. We took up our quarters for the night upon a small island overgrown with trees. We could not construct night-huts, but, the weather being fine, fastened our hammocks to the trees. Feeling rather feverish, I exercised myself by walking, in hopes it would relieve me. In a while we heard distant thunder, and the Negroes, perceiving the approach of rain, made a small covering of tassa leaves, and fixed it on four posts. In about half an hour a violent storm arose, and was soon succeeded by such a heavy shower, that, though I was in a great perspiration, I was forced out of my hammock, and took shelter under the covering. We were in all ten persons, and obliged to stand very close together. The thunder, lightning and rain increased, and all our fires were put out, excepting one brand, which the Negroes preserved to kindle a new fire when the rain should cease. Brother Maehr and I were placed in the middle, and as long as the roof kept out the water I fared pretty well, the Negroes standing close to keep off the wind. But after some time the rain forced its way through the roof, and we and all our things were thoroughly soaked. The Negroes expressed great concern for me, and about ten I felt so weak and weary that I was obliged to lie down dripping wet in my hammock, which had been again fixed under a tree. However, having sufficient covering, I kept warm, and in the morning felt much better, for which I gave thanks to our gracious Saviour.' Brother Maehr being more inured to hardships, continued in good health and spirits.

"The next day we passed several cataracts. It is astonishing to see what these people will do, sometimes rowing, sometimes jumping into the water and pushing the boat forward; at other times they are obliged to swim and drag it along."

Having encountered the danger of ascending upwards of twenty of these cataracts (or ledges of rocks across the whole breadth of the river), the travellers arrived safe and in good health at Bambey, after a voyage of seven days from the time they left Paramaribo, and of five days through the wilderness.*

SECTION V.

Paramaribo.

At the time when the Brethren were invited to begin a mission among the free Negroes, brother Kersten, who has been mentioned in the preceding section, was commissioned by the directors of our missions to inquire into the practicability of serving the Negro slaves in Paramaribo with the gospel. This had been the pious desire of the Brethren from the very commencement of their missionary labours in Surinam; but, for several years, serious obstacles impeded the execution of this design.

At that period, the proprietors of slaves, and many other European residents in Paramaribo, were so strongly prejudiced against the Brethren, that they were prohibited by government admitting any of their neighbours to their family devotions, the privileges obtained from the Surinam Trading Company being exclusively intended to grant liberty to them to propagate the gospel among the Indians residing in the wilderness. The circumstances of their other establishments in the country, however, required that one or more brethren should reside in the capital, to serve as agents to the mission. In this view, Kersten and some other brethren lived there and established the business of tailors, in which they employed hired Negroes as journeymen and apprentices. The Lord blessed the labour of their hands, so that in 1767, they were enabled to purchase a house, with a large piece of ground adjoining, which they laid out in a garden and burying-place. By degrees the prejudices against them subsided, and they gained the esteem of both high and low, and also of the government.

After patient waiting, the brethren Kersten and Rose had, at length, in the year 1768, the joy to perceive a desire excited in three of their Negroes to be instructed in the doctrines of the gospel. For this purpose they came every evening, when their daily work was finished, to Kersten, who could speak with them in their own language. These instructions were continued by Rose, during the absence of Kersten among the free Negroes. Two or three other brethren, who were sent to the assistance of Rose, fell asleep in Jesus soon after their arrival in the country. Amidst these distressing occurrences the Lord preserved the courage of brother Rose, and gave him pleasing tokens that his labour was not in vain. Two of the slaves, whom he had instructed in Christianity, closed their earthly pilgrimage in a very happy frame of mind, confidently relying on the atonement of Jesus, and filled with assured hope of life and immortality. During their sickness they cheerfully testified their faith in our Saviour.

* A coryar is an open boat without sail, propelled solely by rowing.

* Per. Acct. Vol. II. p. 424.

In 1776, brother Kersten returned to Paramaribo to undertake the general superintendence of the Surinam mission. In July the first Negro slave was baptized, and the following month seven more were, by this solemn rite, admitted to the church of Christ. These transactions were performed without the least molestation, either on the part of government or the proprietors of the baptized Negroes.

Meanwhile, two brethren had arrived from Europe as assistants in the mission. One of them commenced the business of a baker, in order to lessen the expenditure of the general missionary fund. Besides the building required for this establishment, their premises were further enlarged by the erection of a chapel, in 1778, and the year after government granted to the mission a piece of land, without the precincts of the city, for a burying-place.

The eagerness of the Negroes to hear the gospel, and its saving and converting influence on their souls, became more and more evident. There were in general about two hundred at the preaching, and scarce a month passed without the baptism of one or more; so that by the end of the year 1779, their congregation consisted of one hundred and one, besides forty who were receiving special instruction, with a view to their admission to the sacred rite of baptism.

The conduct of the Christian Negroes clearly evinced, that their profession of the gospel was something more than a cold assent to certain truths, and a formal observance of the external ordinances of religion. The sincerity of their faith was repeatedly put to a severe trial. Of this the following may serve as a proof. Governor Texier, who had always shown himself a sincere friend to the Brethren, before his return to Europe, in 1780, gave several public entertainments to the gentlemen of the colony. On these occasions he requested from the proprietors of estates the service of such of their slaves as had been baptized. One day, while the heathen Negroes were diverting themselves at a dance, the governor went up to a female slave, whom he had known as a celebrated dancer, but who had now joined the Christian Negroes, and with a view to try the sincerity of her profession, offered her a present if she would join in the dance. But she remained firm to her purpose; steadfastly refused taking any part in the merriment, and at last asked him whether he did not know, that at her baptism, she had changed her name from Kea to Elizabeth, and was no longer the same person. The governor, much pleased with her firmness, replied in a friendly manner: "Yes, I know it, and you do right; keep in this mind till the end of your life, and it will be well for you."

Two Negro women, on another occasion, met with a still harder trial of their sincerity. Their mistress, a so-called Christian, insisted on their joining in some necromantic tricks; but they declared that, on embracing the Christian faith, they had abjured all heathenish superstitions, and therefore could no longer take part in them. Their mistress, hereupon threatened them with the severest punishment, if they persisted in their refusal. Undismayed by this, they gave each other a reciprocal pledge, rather to suffer death itself, than deny the Lord, by again practising pagan sorceries.

An example of fortitude no less striking, was exhibited by a mulatto boy, only sixteen years of age. His master, who was a Jew, being informed of his baptism, threatened to have him bound and flogged. The boy courageously answered: "That you may do; but you cannot thereby rob me of the Lord Jesus, and the grace he hath imparted to me in these days." Fortunately this poor lad met with a protector in an attorney, who had hired him, and by whose interference the Jew was prevented from doing him any injury.

Though these facts plainly indicate, that the animosity against the Brethren, or rather against the gospel which they preached, had not entirely subsided; yet, in general, their endeavours for the conversion of the Negroes, and the consistent conduct of the baptized, gained daily more esteem, so that most proprietors were pleased when their slaves attended the preaching. Exceptions in this respect were very rare, and if at any time a case occurred, in which a master inflicted stripes, or other ill treatment, on his slaves for their attendance at the Brethren's chapel, the Lord enabled them to bear such injuries with patience, and even to rejoice that they were deemed worthy to suffer stripes for the name of Jesus.

A visitation to the mission in this country being deemed necessary, brother Liebisch, one of the directors of the missions, proceeded to Paramaribo in 1790, and during his stay succeeded in making several regulations and arrangements, which promised to promote the missionary cause in these parts.

The war, which in the sequel broke out between Great Britain and Holland, rendered the situation of the missionaries very precarious. They were for many months cut off from all communication both with Europe and North America; provisions became scarce, and rose to an enormous price; and what was still more distressing, no assistants could come to them, though their accumulated and increasing labours required the accession of several missionaries. These difficulties, however, were considerably lessened after the English had taken possession of the colony.

Notwithstanding these external impediments, their exertions for the spiritual benefit of the Negro slaves were crowned with success. Many were awakened and embraced the gospel; so that in 1800, the baptized Negroes amounted to three hundred and fifteen, besides a considerable number of catechumens, and regular hearers at their chapel in Paramaribo.

As an additional instance, to those already related, of the unhealthiness of the climate, and the devotedness of heart to God and his cause, required of persons who engage in missionary labours in this country, it may here be mentioned, that in 1805, brother Nischke departed this life in the short space of a week after his arrival.

Such occurrences, which were by no means unfrequent, not only proved very afflictive to the surviving missionaries, but greatly augmented their labours; for the Lord continued to prosper their work in a remarkable manner. In a letter, dated August the 30th, 1814, the missionaries remark: "The work of God among the Negroes in Paramaribo continues to increase, and we have great reason to rejoice and take courage, when we see such marked proofs of the divine blessing upon our feeble ministry. Sometimes, indeed, occurrences happen which gives us much pain, when people who have begun well, turn again aside and follow the world and the will of the flesh. We mourn over all those whom we are obliged, on that account, to exclude from our fellowship.

"Our monthly prayer-days, as likewise the communion-days, are always distinguished by a particular experience of the grace and love of our Saviour towards his flock. Since the commencement of the year, forty-four adults and eight children have been baptized; forty-four have been made partakers of the Lord's Supper; eight adults and eight children have departed this life. There is also a continual accession of new people, who fill the vacancies occurring in this division, by the baptism of others. The meetings, on Tuesday and Friday evenings, for the reading of the Bible, are frequented by many hearers, particularly by strangers, whose behaviour is marked with such attention and devotion as one could hardly expect from people naturally restless and noisy."

The benefit derived by the Negroes from their attendance on the meetings for reading and expounding the Holy Scriptures, was greatly increased by the generous donation from the British and Foreign Bible Society, of Dutch Bibles and Testaments, as it enabled them to read over at home and meditate upon those portions of holy writ which they had heard read and explained in the chapel. At the same time, the directors of our missions provided for the instruction of the children by publishing for their use a Summary of Christian Doctrine in Negro-English. Since then they have likewise published the Harmony of the Four Gospels, in the vernacular dialect of the Negroes. This increased the eagerness, not only of the children, but also of many adult persons, to learn to read, in which several attained considerable proficiency.

According to the latest intelligence received from that quarter, ninety-one persons were baptized in 1815, and the number of the congregation amounted to six hundred and sixty-three, of whom five hundred and fifteen were communicants.

SECTION VI.

Sommelsdyke.

The missionaries in Paramaribo did not confine their labours to the regular ministry of the gospel in their own chapel in that city; but by frequent visits to the circumjacent plantations, endeavoured to diffuse the knowledge of God and our Saviour among the slaves in every part of the colony.

Government, approving of their laudable exertions, in the year 1785, consigned to them a piece of land on the river Commewyne, where a fortification had formerly stood, called Sommelsdyke. After taking possession of this ground, which contained about fifty acres, thickly overgrown with wood, and one entire swamp, the missionaries were obliged to spend much time and money in clearing and draining it, before they could erect the necessary buildings. Having in some degree accomplished this by the aid of hired Negroes, the missionaries, L. Haidt and Corn. Clausen, moved thither in April 1786; but both of them in a few weeks finished their earthly pilgrimage, probably owing to the heavy damps rising from the land, which was not yet sufficiently drained. Two brethren from Paramaribo undertook the service at this station, till brother Wiez and his wife arrived there in September, from Bambey.

In a religious point of view the prospect was very cheering. Their sermons were in a short time attended by upwards of a hundred and fifty hearers, among whom were Negroes from several adjoining estates. Before the end of the year, above forty had been baptized, and the number of the regular catechumens amounted to upwards of one hundred and fifty.

Difficulties, however, were not wanting. Some proprietors of estates knew so little of the gospel, that they considered its diffusion among the slaves as perfectly useless, and on this account would scarcely permit their attendance at church, much less promote the good cause; though they treated the missionaries, as neighbours, with every mark of civility. Other gentlemen commended the exertions of the Brethren, but refused permission to their slaves to go to Sommelsdyke, requiring that the missionaries should come and preach to them on their respective plantations, in which case they promised to give their Negroes sufficient time to receive religious instruction; and when baptized, allow them occasionally to go to church. The chief reason for these restrictions must be sought for, not so much in aversion to the gospel, as in the difficulty attending their visits to Sommelsdyke. They could not get there any way but by water. These little voyages were often dangerous; and at times, when the slaves obtained permission to go, they could not procure a boat to carry them. These circumstances obliged the missionaries to spend most of their time in visits to the different plantations.

In March, 1778, an event occurred which increased the difficulties just mentioned, and impeded the progress of the mission. One day twelve Negro women and one man went in an old crazy boat to Sommelsdyke. The harder they found it to obtain permission to go, and to procure a conveyance, the more eager were they to improve the opportunity; numbers pressed forward, and thus the boat was too heavily laden. They, however, reached Sommelsdyke without any accident; but on their return the boat sunk. Three Negro women were drowned; the rest saved themselves by swimming. One of the women who could swim, ventured three times into the water to assist others; but during her last effort her strength was exhausted, and she lost her own life while endeavouring to save that of others.

Notwithstanding all the hindrances thrown in their way, the missionaries had the joy to see the work of conversion proceed in stillness, yet with evident marks that it was the work of God and not of man. At the close of 1789, though within that very year a considerable number had been carried off by the small-pox, upwards of a hundred baptized Negroes belonged to Sommelsdyke, besides many others who were enjoying regular instruction in the saving truths of the gospel.

On the one hand, the missionaries in subsequent years still met with occasional obstructions to their benevolent exertions from the stewards on some of the estates; but on the other hand, they had many clear proofs that the Lord smiled on their labours, and that if he is pleased to prosper the work of his servants, no human opposition can prevent its progress. The congregation at Sommelsdyke consisted, in 1816, of one hundred and four baptized Negroes, besides a number of catechumens. Many circumstances related in the preceding section, might be repeated here, as they affected the missionary cause at this station no less than in Paramaribo.

On February 25th, 1816, the British ceded the colony to the Dutch. The new governor, agreeably to the express instructions he had received from the king of the Netherlands, promised his protection to the missionaries. It is only paying a just tribute of gratitude to the late English governor, general Bonham, to acknowledge the very kind attention he uniformly evinced towards them, and the lively and generous interest he took in the mission.

We shall close the history of the missionary labours of the Brethren in South America, with enumerating the number of missionaries employed, and of heathen converted by their means, from the beginning of the mission in this country to the commencement of the present century, comprising a term of sixty-five years. During this period, one hundred and fifty-nine brethren and sisters had served the mission; seventy-five of them had departed this life in the country; sixty-three had returned to Europe, and twenty-one were still actively engaged in the Lord's service, on the different stations in Guiana. During the same period, there had been baptized by them, eight hundred and fifty-five Indians; fifty-nine free Negroes, and seven hundred and thirty-one Negro slaves and mulattoes, making a total of one thousand six hundred and forty-five persons. Of this number, six hundred and fifty-eight had died in the faith of the gospel; five hundred and ninety-four were still living and enjoying the instruction of the missionaries, and the remaining three hundred and ninety-three had forsaken the fellowship of the believers.

CHAPTER V.

MISSION IN THE WEST INDIES.

Danish West India Islands.

With an attempt to instruct the Negro slaves in these islands, the Brethren commenced their endeavours for the conversion of the heathen. They began their labours in the year 1732, when brother Leonard Dober, accompanied by brother David Nitschman, left Herrnhut and proceeded to the island of St. Thomas. Many pious individuals, with whom they became acquainted on their journey, raised very strong objections against their undertaking. Similar objections were repeated in Copenhagen; and the most appalling representations made to them of the difficulties and dangers to which they would expose themselves. But they were not intimidated; and the unshaken trust which they reposed in the help of the Lord, who they believed had called them to this work, at length induced several persons of distinction to interest themselves in their behalf. Some counsellors of state bade them farewell in these words: "Go, then, in the name of God; our Saviour chose fishermen to preach his gospel; and he himself was a carpenter, and was called the son of a carpenter."

They arrived at St. Thomas on the 13th of December, ignorant in what manner and place they might obtain a livelihood; but God had provided for them. A friend in Copenhagen had, without their knowledge, written to a well disposed planter in the island, who received them into his house; and brother Nitschman, engaged in his trade as a carpenter, soon earned a sufficiency for their maintenance.

Immediately on their arrival they made inquiry for Anthony's sister Anna, and her brother Abraham. They received the testimony of salvation by grace, through faith in Jesus, with demonstrations of heartfelt joy. It was not long before other Negroes visited them, and earnestly begged for instruction. This greatly animated the missionaries, who, when observing the eagerness with which the poor slaves listened to the word of reconciliation, gladly endured reproach and poverty.

Many months had not elapsed before they were obliged to separate, as brother Nitschman, who had only accompanied his friend, returned to Europe in April 1733. The faith of the latter was put to a very severe trial, being now left without any visible means of support, as he could not follow his occupation of a potter, owing to the want of clay of a proper quality. Yet he did not lose his courage; and in a few weeks governor Gardelin, who was a pious man, made him the offer of being steward of his household. Dober accepted it on condition that he should be permitted to instruct the Negroes whenever his master did not require his services. But he soon found that this situation left him too little leisure for the prosecution of his missionary calling; and, therefore, in 1731, requested his dismission. He now hired a small room in the village of Tappus, and by watching on the plantations, and other services, earned a scanty livelihood, which enabled him to pay his rent, and procure bread and water; for he seldom had any thing better. His serenity of mind, however, did not forsake him; and he had it now in his power to devote all his time to the instruction of the Negroes.

The year 1733 was signalized by very distressing occurrences in the Danish West Indies. Famine and contagious diseases carried off many people in St. Thomas. About the same time the Negroes in the island of St. Jan revolted, took possession of the fort, and cruelly murdered all those Eupeans who had not time to effect their escape. The rebellion continued above half a year, and the atrocities committed by the insurgents, spread consternation through the other islands, and both the white population and the Negroes were kept in constant terror of each other.*

These events rendered the labours of brother Dober doubly difficult; but, while he was thus struggling with poverty, and oppressed with many anxious cares, fourteen brethren and four sisters were on their way, partly destined for missionary service in St. Thomas, and partly designed to begin a colony in the island of St. Croix.

Two months after the arrival of this company, brother Dober returned to Europe, having been chosen elder of the congregation at Herrnhut, in the place of brother Linner, who had entered into the joy of his Lord. After his removal, those brethren who had come out to succeed him in his labours, in a short time falling victims to the climate, the mission in St. Thomas suffered a temporary suspension.

With a view to renew it, brother Frederick Martin and another brother, arrived in March, 1736, in St. Thomas. The former was in an eminent manner qualified for the work of a missionary, and endowed with peculiar talents for instructing the Negroes. The catechumens, left by brother Dober, greatly rejoiced at his arrival. Their number was daily increasing, so that in a few months upwards of two hundred attended his instructions. On several of these the gospel displayed its converting power; and on the 30th of September, three men were added to the church by holy baptism, as the first fruits of the Negro slaves in this island. The benign influence of the gospel began to evidence itself in a very striking manner, in the altered behaviour of many of those Negroes who attended the meetings. This was acknowledged by several proprietors, and induced them to favour the mission. One of them assisted the missionaries, who still lodged in the village of Tappus, to purchase a small plantation, of which they took possession in August, 1737, and gave it the name of Posaunenberg.

On the other hand, adversaries were not wanting, who opposed the work in every possible way, and rigorously forbade their slaves all intercourse with their teachers, thereby aiming at the total ruin of the mission. By false accusations, they at length succeeded so far, that, towards the end of October, the missionaries were thrown into prison. But the Word of God was not bound; the awakened Negroes continued to meet together for edification, and sometimes assembled in great numbers under the windows of the prison, where they joined in singing and prayer. These meetings likewise afforded their teachers an opportunity of testifying to them of the grace of God in Christ Jesus. Concerning this period, brother Martin writes: "Since our arrest, the Negro congregation is daily increasing; and our Saviour strikingly manifests the power of his grace among them. By our confinement, some white people are brought to serious reflection. I believe the Lord will make it a blessing to the whole island. Even in the fort some good has been done. There is scarce a soldier now who ventures to defame us, though at first they were wicked enough so to do. I cannot describe what the Lord is doing. May he enable us to be a light to our fellow-men; and may he make us more faithful, more active and useful in his service, whether we remain in prison or are set at liberty. I am determined, through the grace of God, to persevere, waiting on him to overule all for his own glory. Be of good courage; many hundred persons in St. Thomas are praying to the Lord for our deliverance."

While the missionaries were in confinement, and before they could transmit any intelligence of their situation to Europe, Count Zinzendorf resolved to visit St. Thomas. He took two brethren and their wives with him, to serve in the mission, and arrived in the island by the end of January, 1739. He immediately waited on the governor, requesting the liberation of the missionaries. This was granted the next day, accompanied by an apology on the part of the governor for what had happened. He also made certain proposals relative to the continuance of the mission; but they were of such a nature that the Brethren could not accede to them, and therefore resolved to appeal to the king himself.

Count Zinzendorf was filled with astonishment at the extent of the work in which the missionaries were engaged. For by this time the number of the Negroes, who regularly attended the preaching of the gospel, amounted to eight hundred. They assembled every evening, as soon as their daily labour was done, and the count frequently addressed them himself. Having in a solemn manner delivered a farewell charge to them, the baptized followed him into the village. On their way they were attacked by some white people with sticks and drawn swords, and dispersed. Hereupon the white people proceeded to the Brethren's plantation, beat and wounded the Negroes who were there, and, during the absence of the missionaries, forced their way into the house, breaking and destroying all the furniture. The governor expressed his strong disapprobation of this outrage, and promised restitution of the damage they had sustained. The count declared that he desired no restitution, but only protection for his brethren, and liberty to preach to the Negroes. Notwithstanding the interference of the governor, similar acts of violence were soon again committed, and even the missionaries themselves were maltreated. For a while, therefore, it became necessary to keep the meetings in the wood, and appoint watchmen to guard the congregation against any sudden attack; but in a few weeks these outrages were suppressed.

Before the count's return to Europe, the Negro men gave him a petition to be presented to the king of Denmark, praying for liberty to be instructed in religion; the Negro women also gave him a similar petition to the queen. These documents, seconded by a written representation from the count himself, had the effect, that an order was passed at the Danish court, dated August 7th, 1739, securing liberty and protection to the Brethren in preaching to the Negroes.

In 1747, brother Martin paid a visit to Europe, and, having presented a memorial to the king of Denmark, obtained a new royal rescript in favour of the mission, by which every thing relative to its uninterrupted continuance, was regulated according to the wishes of the Brethren.

Two years after, bishop Johannes Von Watteville, held a visitation in the three Danish islands, for the purpose of inquiring into the state of the mission, and assisting the brethren employed in it with his advice and counsel. He found that the labour of the missionaries had been less prosperous for some time; comparatively few had been admitted to baptism; many of the baptized had been discouraged by a too rigid exercise of discipline, and some of the missionaries had been disheartened and nearly lost their hopes. It was, therefore, resolved to treat all those who had withdrawn with kindness; and in every case, when their professions appeared sincere, to receive them again into fellowship. The consequence was, that a new awakening arose, which extended to the yet unbaptized catechumens, and by degrees spread through the whole island. Every evening the meetings were frequented by two or three hundred, and on Sundays by eight or nine hundred. On one Sunday no fewer than three hundred and eighty Negroes requested to have their names enrolled among the catechumens; the whole number of whom, in a short time, amounted to nine hundred, not including from two to three hundred children. During bishop Watteville's stay in the island, which lasted two months, above a hundred persons were baptized. Among these were several old, blind and lame people, who came from a considerable distance. Hitherto the missionaries had been scrupulous about the baptism of infants, but they now came to a resolution to baptize the children of believing parents as soon after their birth as convenient.

* The rebellion was not suppressed till the governor sent a strong force of mulattoes to the island. The rebels finding resistance vain, resorted to the following horrid expedient, in order to avoid being made prisoners. One after the other suffered himself to be shot by the ringleaders, and when they had completed their murderous work, they shot themselves.—Risler, Part II. Sec. 2. p. 14.

The governor, and most other gentlemen in this and the two adjacent islands, behaved with great politeness to bishop Watteville, and gave the Christian Negroes the testimony of good conduct, requesting that the vacancies, occasioned by the deaths or removals of missionaries, might be filled up as soon as possible.

Among those zealous servants of God, who about this time were called to receive the reward of their labours, was brother Frederick Martin, who entered into the joy of his Lord in 1750, after zealously serving the Negroes with the gospel for fifteen years, and that during the most difficult period of the mission.*

After the return of bishop Watteville, the mission in this island continued in a flourishing state. In 1753, the missionaries changed the name of their plantation from Posaunenberg to New Herrnhut; and, having purchased an estate on the opposite side of the island, called it Nisky. In both these places they published the glad tidings of salvation to great numbers of eager hearers; and upwards of an hundred were annually added to the church by baptism. They had also a small meeting-house in the village of Tappus, chiefly for the convenience of the sick and infirm. They likewise preached on several estates, and many hundred children, living dispersed through the whole island, were diligently visited and instructed by brother Ronner. They were greatly assisted in their labours by the native assistants, of whom they had twenty-four, whose private exhortations, no less than their public testimonies of the gospel, were often strikingly blessed to their countrymen. Most of the planters became convinced that the instruction of the Negroes tended to their own advantage, and therefore gladly promoted their baptism and attendance at church, requesting the missionaries to visit them frequently. Government also, both at home and abroad, acknowledged the beneficial effects of their labours, and whenever required, was ready to afford them protection.

In order to trace the beginning of the missionary establishments of the Brethen in the adjacent Danish islands, it is necessary to go back a few years in the narrative.

In the year 1733, the West India and Guinea Company at Copenhagen made a purchase of the large and fine island of St. Croix, which had been abandoned by the French for the space of forty years; and, having remained so long uncultivated, had become a perfect wilderness. The Lord Chamberlain, Count De Pless, who had kindly patronized the mission to Greenland, possessed six estates in this island. With a view to the cultivation of these lands, and the instruction of his Negroes, he applied to Count Zinzendorf for two brethren as overseers on each of his plantations. The request was no sooner made known to the congregation at Herrnhut, than several brethren and sisters offered themselves to form a colony in St. Croix, in hopes of thereby obtaining an opportunity for preaching the gospel to the slaves. Count Zinzendorf indeed had serious objections to this scheme, fearing lest the colonists, by the unavoidable cares and labours of a temporal nature, which the situation required, should be diverted from their chief object; but as the majority of votes was in favour of the measure, he acquiesced. Out of those who offered themselves for this undertaking, four married couple and ten unmarried brethren were selected; some of whom were destined for the mission in St. Thomas.

After a most perilous voyage, and a short stay in St. Thomas, the colonists arrived in St. Croix about midsummer in 1731, taking twelve Negroes with them to assist in the cultivation of the lands. But the insalubrity of the climate, added to their incessant labours, in which they exerted themselves beyond their strength, soon impaired their health; they all fell sick, and before the end of the year ten of them finished their mortal race. In 1735 their places were supplied by eleven persons; and Doctor Grothaus, a celebrated physician in Copenhagen, without the knowledge of the Brethren, went thither also for the purpose of assisting them with his medical skill; but he died almost immediately on his arrival. In other respects, too, the colony did not answer; the survivors therefore (being only nine out of twenty-nine,) partly returned to Europe, and partly proceeded to St. Thomas, to assist in that mission.

Though the colonizing system in St. Croix was thus relinquished, the Brethren did not altogether give up their exertions for the conversion of the Negroes. The missionaries in St. Thomas occasionally visited this island, especially brother Martin, whose testimony of the gospel never failed to arrest the attention of the Negroes, and create an earnest desire in them to be regularly instructed; and this desire was not a little increased by such slaves as had been awakened in St. Thomas, and were from time to time sold to proprietors of estates in St. Croix.

When this intelligence reached Europe, several brethren offered themselves as missionaries for this island. Among these we notice, in particular, Albinus Theodore Feder, a student of theology, who, being properly ordained, was confirmed by a royal rescript, and furnished with a mandate for his protection against lawless people; and Christian Gottlieb Israel. Israel was born of poor parents, educated in the orphan-house at Herrnhut, and afterwards learnt the business of a weaver. His constitution was very delicate; he was lame and mostly walked with a crutch; but he was imbued with an ardent and noble spirit, and neither his bodily infirmity nor any representations could damp his missionary zeal. After a voyage of about eight weeks, these two brethren landed on the island of St. Eustatia in January, 1740. Hence they sailed for St. Thomas in an English sloop. The captain being unacquainted with the passage, the vessel struck upon a rock, and was wrecked early in the morning of the 17th. The sailors took to the boat, and left the missionaries with the vessel upon the rock. A row of stones, about a foot distant from each other, lay across from the rock to the beach. Feder let himself down with a rope into the sea, in order to get on shore, hoping thus to obtain assistance for his lame brother. But the fury of the waves threw him into the sea, to rise no more. Israel was now left alone on the rock. The wreck of the vessel for a while skreened him against the dashing of the waves; but being soon entirely broken to pieces, he was every minute in danger of being washed into the sea. In the afternoon some people threw a rope to him, by which he was dragged on shore. Mr. Von der Pol hospitably entertained him at his house, and procured him a passage to Tortola; from whence he sailed to St. Jan, and finally arrived in St. Thomas on the 18th of February.

Besides brother Israel, George Weber and his wife moved to St. Croix in 1740, to commence a regular missionary establishment in that island. A year or two after, brother Martin being there on a visit, succeeded in purchasing a small estate for the Brethren, of which they took possession in the beginning of 1741; and in July the same year he baptized two men and two women, being the first Negroes in this island who were added to the Christian church.

During the first years of their abode here the missionaries had to encounter various difficulties. The unhealthiness of the air and the hard labour, to which they cheerful submitted in order to lessen the expense of the mission, occasioned the deaths of many in a short time after their arrival. And this was rendered doubly afflictive, as in case of the departure of an ordained missionary, who had been confirmed by the king, impediments were thrown in the way of his successors, if they had not by name obtained the royal confirmation. In the sequel, however, these obstacles were removed; and since then our brethren have been uniformly protected in the enjoyment of their privileges. No missionary, however, was stationed here for a constancy till the year 1753, when brother Ohneberg moved hither.

A few years after the mission in St. Croix had regularly commenced, the attention of the Brethren was directed to the small island of St. Jan, likewise belonging to the crown of Denmark. Previously to this, they had occasionally visited on the island, as some of their converts from St. Thomas had been sold to proprietors on it. But in 1741, a circumstance occurred which gave a new impulse to their exertions. Jens Rasmus, a pious man, and overseer on a plantation, had formed an acquaintance with the Brethren in St. Thomas, and begun to preach to the Negroes under his care. At his request, brother Martin and other missionaries from St. Thomas assisted him in this labour of love, and occasionally abode some days, or even weeks, in the island, instructing the slaves. Their testimony of Jesus and his atonement, was, amidst difficulties of various kinds, attended with blessing. The work here was for a number of years cared for by the missionaries in St. Thomas, till brother J. Brukker, in 1751, took charge of it, residing on an estate purchased some time before, and called Bethany.

The Brethren had thus, by the grace of God, succeeded in extending their benevolent labours to the three islands under the dominion of Denmark. The great Head of his church, in whose name and strength they had begun the work, and by whose blessing on their exertions they had achieved much during the first year of poverty, opposition and manifold hindrances, did not forsake this vineyard, nor those who laboured in it, in the times of comparative ease and tranquillity, which now succeeded.

* It is worthy of notice, that near fifty brethren and sisters, employed in the missionary establishments in the three Danish islands, had departed this life within seventeen years.—Risler, Part II. Sec. 2. p. 52.

As soon as St. Croix and St. Jan had been supplied with resident missionaries, the good effects of it became visible in the larger auditories which attended the preaching of the gospel, and the increased number of those who were engrafted into the church by holy baptism. In St. Croix the number annually baptized amounted to upwards of a hundred, and in St. Jan it exceeded fifty. In the former place, the missionaries resided for some time on one of the Company's plantations, called Princess, till they found means of purchasing an estate of four acres, on which they erected a church and dwelling-house, and called it Friedensthal.

In 1755, these islands were ceded by the West India and Guinea Company to the king, who appointed a governor-general for all the islands. This gentleman fixed his residence in St. Croix, and on every occasion showed himself the friend and protector of the mission. This was peculiarly manifest during an insurrection of the Negroes, which had for its object the massacre of all the white inhabitants, on Christmas night, 1759. Some malicious people accused several of the Negroes baptized by the missionaries of being implicated in the conspiracy; but their innocence was fully proved by the delinquents themselves. On this occasion the governor acted towards them like a father. By his advice, they omitted the large assemblies of the Negroes while the commotion lasted; and did not begin them again till they had obtained his permission; and in order to authorize the meetings and encourage the Negroes in their attendance, he himself and some other gentlemen were present. Not long after he had a fresh opportunity of evincing his good will towards the mission. An order having been issued that no Negro should be seen in the streets or roads after seven o'clock in the evening, he exempted from this restriction all those who attended the meetings of the Brethren, and could produce a certificate signed by one of their teachers.

In consequence of the war in 1760, all intercourse with the English colonies was prohibited. This occasioned great scarcity of provisions, which was the more severe as it succeeded a long continued drought. Many Negroes perished with absolute hunger. Though the missionaries had but a scanty supply themselves, they did not suffer any of their Negroes to be in real want, and even assisted to the utmost of their ability those on other plantations.

Of the internal state of the mission at this period, the Brethen employed in it give the following report: "By the preaching of the gospel, many a slave of sin has attained to knowledge of his misery, and to the enjoyment of grace in the blood of Jesus; on which account we cheerfully devote soul and body in his service, to help to gather in the reward of the travail of his soul from among the heathen. In this we are obliged to conform to their circumstances, and must in general employ the night for their service. The baptized are increasing in self-knowledge and becoming more grounded in the faith. What neither law nor the most rigorous discipline of their overseers can accomplish, is effected by the doctrine of Christ's sufferings. Of this the masters are, for the most part, so fully sensible, that they are pleased when their slaves go to our church. The children have their separate meetings, and are visited from time to time; but as they are very early employed in all kinds of labour, we cannot attend to them with that care we could wish."

This pleasing state of the mission continued in subsequent years. The Buffals (i. e. Negroes newly imported from Africa), in particular, manifested a great desire of hearing the Word of God and being saved.

In 1765, two disastrous events occurred. By the carelessness of other people, the mission-house at the west-end of St. Croix, lately erected, took fire and was burnt down. In St. Jan the church was thrown down by a storm; but to the great joy of the Negroes, who had been obliged to meet in the open air, and to forego the celebration of the Lord's Supper, it was rebuilt the next year.

In 1767, seventeen slaves, belonging to the congregation in St. Croix, were carried to Eustatia. Here they were visited the following year by a missionary, and exhorted to constancy and faithfulness; and some regulations, tending to their edification, were made among them.

The number of communicants in St. Thomas had so much increased, that it was found necessary to administer this ordinance, not only at New Herrnhut, as had been the case hitherto, but also at Nisky, where a new church had been erected. The re-building of the mission-house and the erection of a church at the west end of St. Croix, were also completed, and brother Melchior Schmidt and his wife moved thither in May, 1771. This place received the name of Friedensberg.

The following year was a period of much distress, but also of many mercies. In the night of the 31st of August, a hurricane of unusual violence did considerable damage in all the three islands, but particularly in St. Croix. The newly built house in Friedensberg was moved out of its place and greatly injured; and in Friedensthal the church, the dwelling-houses, and all the offices, were blown down. The missionaries and their families, who had sought an asylum in the cellar, were for several hours kept in constant jeopardy of their lives, but were mercifully preserved. This tempest was succeeded by a general scarcity, famine and sickness. Great numbers died, especially of the Negroes. Within a few months several brethren and sisters, employed in the mission, were removed to a better world. This greatly augmented the labours of the survivors; but they were powerfully strengthened and encouraged in their work by the pleasing progress of the mission. These external distresses seemed to awaken a new desire in the Negroes to attain to a knowledge of those things which belonged to their true peace. New people constantly flocked to the preaching: and though in Friedensthal it was held for nearly a whole year in the open air, till the new church was built, the auditory mostly amounted to a thousand or upwards; and many were every month added to the church by baptism.

A company of six missionaries, sailing for these islands in 1776, suffered shipwreck on the 30th of November off Walsey, one of the Shetland isles. But being very near the shore, they were all saved except one sister, who, falling in among the wreck, could not indeed be disentangled from the rigging. The proprietor of the isle, John Bruce Stewart, treated them with great hospitality, till they found an opportunity to go to Norway. From thence they proceeded the following February to St. Thomas.

Being on the 21st of August, 1782, fifty years since the beginning of this mission, and also of the missionary labours of the Brethren in general, this important event was in all the three islands celebrated with joyful solemnity. From the reports of the missionaries at that time, it appears, that within this period they had baptized eight thousand eight hundred and thirty-three adult Negroes and two thousand nine hundred and seventy-four children; of these, two thousand three hundred and eighty-one adults and nine hundred and seventy-five children had died. And of the missionaries and their assistants, their wives and children, one hundred and twenty-seven had entered into eternal rest during these fifty years.

To accommodate those Negroes who lived at too great a distance from Bethany to attend the meetings regularly, the Brethren, in the above-mentioned year, bought a house and a piece of ground in another part of the island of St. Jan. In this place, which was called Emmaus, a church was soon erected, and a missionary appointed for its service. Not only the slaves, but many of the white inhabitants in the neighbourhood, rejoiced at this establishment, declaring that they would diligently improve the opportunity thus afforded them, to join in divine worship.

The directors of the missions, considering that a visitation to these islands, by one of their number, might in various respects prove beneficial, brother John Loretz undertook this important mission. He arrived in St. Croix early in the year 1781, and spent several weeks here and in St. Thomas in making himself acquainted with all the circumstances of the mission, and in deliberating with the missionaries and the native assistants on the best means of promoting the great work in which they were engaged. Among other measures, it was resolved to bestow more time and labour in translating select portions of the holy Scriptures into the vernacular tongue of the Negroes. Brother Auerbach, who had occupied his leisure in this way, undertook the translation of the Sundays' Gospels and Epistles, the Harmony of the Four Evangelists, and the catechism entitled Summary of the Doctrine of Christ and his Apostles. A severe attack of fever so debilitated brother Loretz, that he found himself unable to visit the island of St. Jan. He, however, obtained all the necessary information from the missionaries, which enabled him, on his return, to give to the directors a full report of this interesting mission in all its branches.

During this year, the Brethen experienced another encouraging proof of the benevolence of government. In consequence of a rumour, that the slaves at the west end of the island of St. Croix were plotting another rebellion, many were put into confinement, and a proclamation was issued prohibiting the Negroes from being seen in the streets after six o'clock in the evening; containing a clause, by which all those Negroes who were going to the mission church in Friedensberg were exempt from this restriction.

In 1781, the mission in these islands sustained a very serious loss, in consequence of the departure of brother Martin Mack. He had joined the church of the Brethren in 1731. A few years after he went to America, assisted the late Reverend George Whitfield in the erection of Nazareth, and took an active part in the building of Bethlehem. Afterwards he was employed for almost twenty years in the mission among the North American Indians, during a period of persecution and many dangers. In 1762, he came to the Danish West Indies as superintendent of all the missionary establishments of the Brethren in these islands; and during the space of twenty-two years, spent all the energies of his body and mind in the zealous discharge of the important duties of his office. His fellow-labourers loved and esteemed him as a man of tried integrity and unabating ardour in the noble cause in which he was engaged, and who had grown gray in the service of his Lord. The governor-general, besides many private gentlemen, honoured his funeral with their presence, as the last testimony of respect they could give to one whose memory will be held in deserved veneration as long as the inhabitants of these islands shall feel the value of the gospel, and know how to appreciate the services of those who spend health and strength, yea life itself, in its propagation.

After the decease of this faithful servant of Christ, it was found more expedient to commit the general superintendency of the mission not to one individual, but to a committee, consisting of one or more missionaries from each settlement. The advantages of this regulation were soon apparent. New zeal and activity on the part of the missionaries, and new attention to the gospel on the part of their converts and hearers, became manifest. Many were baptized; those who had been of long standing in the church were excited to be more diligent in making their calling and election sure; even such as had been excluded on account of misconduct, were led to serious self-examination; and on giving evidence of sincere repentance, were restored to the fellowship of the believers.

At the same time difficulties, which occasionally impeded the pleasing progress of the mission, were not wanting. In one instance, the increasing number of Roman Catholic proprietors diminished the auditories of our missionaries. For these gentlemen not only employed their slaves till a late hour on Saturday evening, but even obliged them to work on the Lord's day, and thus deprived them of the bare possibility of attending the church. Some of these masters required their slaves to bring them a stipulated sum of money every week, which they must earn in the best manner they could. Money being scarce at that time, they had but a poor chance of earning much; and this tempted many Negroes to resort to dishonest and fraudulent practices, in order to avoid punishment, which was most rigorously inflicted if they failed in their payment.

In the year 1797, the mission was again visited by one of the directors from Europe, brother John Renatus Verbeck. During his stay at New Herrnhut, in St. Thomas, he observed that the increase of this congregation had not, within the last years, been so great as formerly. This apparent declension was the natural consequence of the long period during which the gospel had been preached in this island, whereby almost every plantation was supplied with a number of Christian Negroes. The island of St. Croix, which is the largest and most populous of the three, still presented the widest field for missionary exertions. St. Jan, the least in natural extent, contained also a comparatively small number of converts.

Brother Leupold and his wife, together with a single sister, destined for the service of this mission, and who were sailing for St. Thomas in 1798, had on the 11th of October the misfortune to be captured by an English privateer and carried to the island of Tortola. Here they suffered much distress, being kept five days without food, except once, when they found an opportunity of buying some fish. They were left whole days without a drop of water. Their ignorance of the English language increased their difficulty, till, through the kind interference of a German captain, they obtained permission to go with another vessel to St. Thomas.

In the performance of their frequently arduous duties, the missionaries made daily experience, that "the joy of the Lord was their strength." The power of the gospel evidenced itself in their converts by enabling them to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour" by a conduct generally consistent with their profession. This the more strongly attested the reality of their faith, as attempts were not wanting to seduce them from their steadfastness. Some impious masters even resorted to acts of cruelty, to tempt them to the commission of sin, and in other instances the poor creatures were most severely punished for the slightest fault; but the grace of God enabled them to bear the one with Christian meekness and patience, and resist the other by "taking the shield of faith and the helmet of salvation." Influenced by the precepts of the Word of God, they meekly submitted to the galling yoke of slavery, and not unfrequently recognized a gracious Providence overruling it for the salvation of their souls. Thus an old Negro once remarked: "Though I was kidnapped in my native country, and thievishly sold, yet I feel no resentment against those who did it; for I believe I was brought hither by the will of God; and I cannot be sufficiently thankful to our Saviour, that he has deemed me worthy, in preference to many others, to hear his Word, by which I have learned to know the way of salvation."

M. von Malleville, hitherto commandant of St. Thomas, being appointed governor-general in 1796, fixed his residence in St. Croix, being the seat of the government. But the pleasure of the missionaries in having this sincere friend in the island, was of very short duration. October 11th, he was seized with an apoplexy, and on the 22d departed this life in confident reliance on the atonement of Jesus. Agreeably to his request, his remains were interred in the burying-ground of the mission at Friedensthal, a funeral oration having been previously delivered in the Dutch Calvinist church (in which he had been educated), by the incumbent. All the inhabitants of these islands lost in him a man of strict probity, who made it his constant and zealous care to promote their true welfare. The missionaries in particular were deprived of a sincere and active friend, who, in close fellowship of spirit with them, grounded all his hopes for time and eternity on the merit of Christ. It must here be added, that our brethren have continued to enjoy the benevolence of succeeding governors, and, in general, of all the proprietors; and, if different sentiments were entertained by any, they were ashamed openly to avow them.

Of the growing respect for the missionaries and their labours, two gratifying instances occurred about this time. In 1795, they were requested to supply the vacancy which had occurred in the Dutch church at Christianstadt, in St. Croix, by performing divine service in the same, till the arrival of the new minister in 1796. Two years later, the heirs of Count Schimmelman made some regulations on their estates, by means of which the missionaries could commence a regular school with all the Negro children on those plantations. In St. Jan, likewise, the children were sent to Emmaus for instruction. Their eagerness and progress in learning were highly satisfactory to their teachers.

Among those of the Christian Negroes who during this period finished their race of sorrow and suffering here below, and entered into the joy of their Lord, the aged man Benjamin deserves to be particularly mentioned. He belonged to the Mandingo tribe, his father being a Mahomedan teacher; and in this religion he had educated his son, who remained in his native country till he was more than twenty years old. On his arrival in the West Indies, he instructed his countrymen in the religion of his forefathers, using every effort to propagate and maintain the Mahomedan faith. At length, however, he yielded to the testimony and influence of the gospel, was baptized in 1779, and in 1796 closed his earthly pilgrimage in a joyful hope of entering, not into a heaven of sensual delights, but into the true paradise of God.

Hitherto these islands had remained undisturbed by those political commotions which during this period agitated nearly the whole of Europe, and spread terror and perplexity even to distant parts of the globe. But early in the year 1801, this tranquillity was interrupted, in consequence of hostilities having commenced between Great Britain and Denmark. In March an English fleet appeared off the coast of St. Thomas, and arrangements were made to repel force by force. The commandant, however, deeming resistance useless on account of the superior number and strength of the British, resolved to capitulate. The capitulation was signed that very evening by both parties, and early on the 19th the fort was surrendered with the usual formalities. The islands of St. Croix and St. Jan also surrendered without resistance. Thus the effusion of human blood was happily prevented; nevertheless the mission was not wholly exempt from the burthens and troubles attendant on war. The price of provisions was greatly enhanced, the correspondence with the different settlements and with Europe was interrupted, and even their daily meetings were for a time suspended.

The establishment at Friedensberg, in St. Croix, felt the effects of the war most severely, the mission-house being occupied as an hospital for the British troops. Part of the missionary family went to Friedensthal, the rest were kindly lodged on a neighbouring plantation. For some time the regular service was continued in the chapel, and attended by crowded auditories; but the smell of the sick and dying becoming daily more offensive, rendered this no longer either safe or practicable. After the lapse of two months, the hospital was removed to the west end of the island.

Towards the close of the same year, the mission was deprived of one of the most intelligent and useful native assistants, who for more than fifty years had walked worthily of his calling by the gospel, namely, the Negro Cornelius, who entered into rest in the year 1801. This man was in many respects distinguished among his countrymen, which will render the following brief sketch of his life interesting.

About fifty years ago he became concerned for the salvation of his soul, and felt a strong impulse to attend the preaching of our missionaries, and their private instructions. However, he could not at once forsake his heathenish customs. It happened once that he attended a merry-making of his countrymen. Even into this house of riot the good Shepherd followed this poor straying sheep. The late brother Frederic Martin passing by, and being made attentive to the uproar, looked in at the door and immediately espied his scholar Cornelius. He beckoned to him to come out; and in a friendly, but serious and emphatic address, represented to him that it was not becoming for one who had declared that he would give his heart to our Saviour, to attend such meetings as these. "Here," said the missionary, "the devil has his work, and you have assured me that you will not be his slave. But now I discover that your heart is still in his power, for you love the vanities of the world and the company of the children of disobedience, in whom he rules. It would, therefore, be better that you left off coming to our meetings and to the school." This offended him greatly, and he thought, "What is that to the white man, and what do I care for him." However, his amusement was spoiled for that time; he went home much displeased, and resolved never more to visit the missionaries or attend their meetings. But his heart was not at rest, and his convictions grew so strong that he could not sleep at night. The address of the missionary sounded continually in his ears, and made so strong an impression upon him that he altered his mind and visited him. Being received, not, as he feared, with displeasure, but with great cordiality, he was exceedingly affected, and with tears described the distress of his mind during the preceding days.

In 1749 he was baptized, and ever since remained faithful to the grace conferred on him. He had an humbling and growing sense of the depravity of his heart, but he also made daily progress in the knowledge and grace of his Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

God had blessed him with a good natural understanding. He had learned the business of a mason well, and had the appointment of master-mason to the royal buildings, in which employment he was esteemed by all who knew him, as a clever, upright and disinterested man. He laid the foundation of each of the six chapels belonging to our mission in these islands. He was able to write and speak the Creole, Dutch, Danish, German and English languages, which gave him a great advantage above the other Negroes. Till 1767, he was a slave in the royal plantation, which afterwards belonged to Count Schimmelman. He first purchased the freedom of his wife, and then laboured hard to gain his own liberty, which, after much entreaty and the payment of a considerable ransom, he effected. God blessed him and the work of his hands in such a manner, that he could also by degrees purchase the emancipation of his six children.

In 1754 he was appointed assistant in the mission. After his emancipation, he greatly exerted himself in the service of the Lord, especially among the people of his own colour; and spent whole days, and often whole nights, in visiting them on the different plantations. He possessed a peculiar talent for expressing his ideas with great clearness, which rendered his discourses pleasing and edifying as well to white people as to Negroes. Yet he was by no means elated by the talents he possessed. His character was that of an humble servant of Christ, who thought too meanly of himself to treat others with contempt. To distribute unto the indigent and assist the feeble was the delight of his heart, and they always found in him a generous and sympathizing friend and faithful adviser.

While thus zealously exerting himself in promoting the salvation of his countrymen, he did not neglect the concerns of his family. We have already seen how sedulously he cared for their tempopal prosperity, in working hard to purchase their freedom. But he was more solicitous for the welfare of their souls. God blessed his instructions, and he had the joy of seeing his whole family share in the salvation of the Lord. Being found faithful, they were employed as assistants in the mission.

The infirmities of old age increasing upon him, he ardently longed to depart and be with Christ. A constant cough and pain in his side checked his great activity, caused occasional dejection of mind, and seemed at times to shake his faith and fortitude. He now and then complained of a declension of his love to the Lord Jesus; and once, while meditating on that text, "I have somewhat against thee because thou hast left thy first love," he exclaimed: "Ah! I too have left my first love!" A few days before his end, being visited by one of the missionaries, he said, "I ought to have done more, and loved and served my Saviour better. Yet I firmly trust that he will receive me in mercy, for I come to him as a poor sinner, having nothing to plead but his grace and righteousness through his blood." His children and several of his grandchildren having assembled round his bed, he addressed them in the following very solemn and impressive manner:

"I rejoice exceedingly, my dearly beloved children, to see you once more together before my departure, for I believe that my Lord and Saviour will soon come and take your father home to himself. You know, dear children, what my chief concern has been respecting you, as long as I was with you; how frequently I have exhorted you not to neglect the day of grace, but to surrender yourselves with soul and body to your Redeemer, and to follow him faithfully. Sometimes I have dealt strictly with you, in matters which I believed would bring harm to your souls, and grieve the Spirit of God, and I have exerted my parental authority to prevent mischief: but it was all done out of love to you. However, it may have happened, that I have sometimes been too severe. If this has been the case, I beg you, my dear children, to forgive me; O forgive your poor dying father."

Here he was obliged to stop, most of the children weeping and sobbing aloud. At last one of his daughters recovered herself, and said, "We, dear father, we alone have cause to ask forgiveness, for we have often made your life heavy, and have been disobedient children. The rest joined in the same confession. The father then continued: "Well, my dear children, if all of you have forgiven me, then attend to my last wish and dying request. Love one another! Do not suffer any quarrels and disputes to arise among you after my decease. No, my children," raising his voice, "love one another cordially: Let each strive to show proofs of love to his brother or sister, nor suffer yourselves to be tempted by any thing to become proud; for by that you may even miss of your soul's salvation, but pray our Saviour to grant you lowly minds and humble hearts. If you follow this advice of your father, my joy will be complete, when I shall once see you all again in eternal bliss, and be able to say to our Saviour, 'Here, Lord, is thy poor, unworthy Cornelius and the children whom thou hast given me. I am sure our Saviour will not forsake you; but I beseech you, do not forsake him.'" He fell gently asleep in Jesus on the 29th of November, being, according to his own account, eighty-four years of age.

The sovereignty of these islands being soon again ceded to the crown of Denmark, no events occurred for a series of years, either in the internal course, or the external affairs of the mission, remarkably distinguishing its history from that of preceding periods. The missionaries continued their labours with their usual activity, and had many proofs that the doctrine of "Christ crucified is the power and wisdom of God unto salvation to every true believer, whether bond or free."

During this period they were enabled to realize a wish they had long entertained, of forming a third settlement on the island of St. Croix. This settlement, which was called Friedensfield, from its central situation, proved a great convenience to many old and infirm Negroes, who were frequently deprived of the means of grace in consequence of the great distance of the other stations.

In 1811 the missionary J. G. Haensel returned to St. Thomas from a visit he had made in Europe. One of the first services he performed for the dissemination of gospel knowledge, and which gave him peculiar delight, was to distribute a number of Testaments in the Spanish language to those of that nation who frequently visit St. Thomas from Porto Rico. Concerning this distribution he remarks: "As the worthy British and Foreign Bible Society had been pleased to place that trust in me, I felt happy in having so early an opportunity of fulfilling their kind intentions. I had much enjoyment in performing this act of benevolence. The gloomy countenances of the Spaniards, which in general seem to indicate rather a sullen disposition, brightened with an expression of gratitude, of which their tears gave further evidence, and they declared their regard and love for their benefactors in the warmest terms."

The following year a breach was made in the missionary family at Friedensfield on St. Croix, the Lord permitting his faithful servant, brother Netz, to enter into eternal rest, after having laboured in this part of his vineyard for nineteen years. His brethren speak of him as peculiarly gifted for missionary labours. His discourses were admirably adapted to the capacity of the Negroes, and instances were not wanting, which sufficiently proved, that the Lord laid a special blessing upon his testimony, which was singularly calculated to awaken sinners, and magnify salvation by grace through faith in Jesus.

The voyage of a company of missionaries, in 1813 and 1814, was attended with peculiar hardships and dangers. They were partly destined for the mission in Greenland, and partly for that in the Danish West India islands, and all sailed from Copenhagen, in March, 1813, on board the Hualfisken, bound for Leith in Scotland. In the channel between Scotland and Norway they were discovered by Captain Cathcart of the Alexandria frigate, who sent an officer on board demanding the ship's papers, and ordering the Danish captain to attend on board the frigate. To the no small consternation of himself and the passengers, the license was declared to have expired, and all the crew were put on board the frigate, and an English lieutenant, a midshipman and twelve sailors took possession of the Danish vessel. The captain, however, was suffered to remain, an explanation having been given that the ship was certainly bound for Leith. The ship was ordered to Gothenberg, but unfavourable weather rendered all their attempts to reach that harbour ineffectual; and, after encountering several perils, they were obliged to cast anchor at Marstrand, where they were detained till the 10th of April.

Their situation was rendered peculiarly distressing, as they could not even send a letter to the Brethren's minister at Gothenburg, or to any of their friends; all intercourse with the land being strictly forbidden. In other respects, their detention on board was rendered as comfortable as possible. Brother Ramsch (one of the missionaries going to the West Indies) remarks, "We should not do justice if we did not bear testimony to the kind and generous conduct of all the English officers we had to do with; I might quote a variety of instances, in which they showed every readiness to make our situation as little irksome as possible."

While lying off Marstrand some of them were ordered to Gothenberg to undergo an examination. They were treated with much kindness, and only such questions put to them as tended to prove the truth of the captain's report.

This unexpected occurrence so protracted the voyage to Leith, that the missionaries, destined for the West Indies, could not sail with the spring convoy. They therefore spent the summer in the Brethren's settlement at Fulneck, in Yorkshire.

In November, 1813, they set sail from Portsmouth; their company, consisting of the brethren Ramsch and Schaerf, with their wives and two other sisters.

On this voyage likewise they were exposed to imminent danger. January the 10th, 1814, they were chased by an American privateer. Captain Lennon informed them, that he considered it his duty to defend himself, and immediately prepared for action, assigning a place of safety for them in the hold. A fierce engagement now commenced. The English ship mounted only six guns, with twenty-two men and boys; the American had fourteen guns and one hundred and twenty-five men. Thrice he attempted to board, but met with such steady and determined resistance from Captain Lennon, that, after a contest of more than four hours, he was obliged to sheer of with considerable damage, and the loss of several killed and wounded. The English ship had one killed and eleven wounded; the captain had his hat shot through and received several contusions.

The terror of the missionaries, during the fight, may more easily be conceived than described. Their gratitude and joy were so much the greater, when they not only found they had been graciously delivered from the threatening danger, but before the close of another day, saw themselves in the midst of their brethren and sisters in St. Croix.

A month had scarce elapsed after the arrival of this company, when brother J. G. Haensel, of St. Thomas, entered into everlasting rest. He was sixty-four years of age; and it may be truly said of him, that he had grown gray and exhausted his strength in his endeavours to bring the heathen to the fold of the good Shepherd. He had served the missionary cause in Tranquebar and Nicobar in the East Indies, for eighteen years, and, after a short rest in Germany, he laboured for the same period in the West Indies; so that thirty-six years of his valuable life had been devoted to the glorious work of evangelizing the heathen.

After the departure of this faithful servant of God, the missionaries continued to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ to the Negroes in St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. Jan, and to teach their converts to observe all things whatsoever Jesus hath commanded. And the Lord blessed their labours for the conversion of the Negroes, many of whom were in subsequent years added to the church by baptism.

While thus zealously attending on their ministry, their divine Master was pleased to exercise their faith by a severe trial. Towards the end of the summer of 1817, a contagious fever prevailed in these islands, which was peculiarly fatal to Europeans, carrying off great numbers, and likewise extending its ravages to the missionary settlements. Most of the missionaries suffered from it; and in less than five weeks three brethren and two sisters, finished their earthly pilgrimage, and entered into the joy of their Lord.

SECTION II.

Jamaica.

Several respectable gentlemen in London, who possessed considerable estates in Jamaica, had with much zeal and expense supported various measures for the instruction of their Negroes in Christianity, but without any apparent success. Becoming acquainted with the Brethren and their successful labours in St. Thomas, they requested the directors of our missions to send some missionaries to instruct their slaves, adding, that it would be particularly gratifying to them if the Rev. Zacharias George Caries, whose sermons they had themselves attended with acceptance and profit, should be found willing to engage in this service.

Brother Caries readily consented, and, with two other brethren, sailed for Jamaica in October, 1754. On their arrival every thing favoured their undertaking. The promoters of it generously cared for their external support, and erected a house on a piece of land given by them for the use of the mission, and which was called Carmel. They also encouraged the Negroes to attend the preaching of the gospel, allowing them the necessary time and liberty. They came in great numbers, and, at the end of the first year, the missionaries computed their regular hearers at about eight hundred, of whom twenty-six had been baptized. Besides preaching on the three estates belonging to the promoters of the mission, brother Caries was invited by several other gentlemen to instruct their slave Negroes also. He met with but little opposition from the white people; even those who at first were rather hostile in their views, changed their sentiments almost as soon as they heard and conversed with him. Indeed they attended his sermons in such numbers (in many cases with evident blessing to themselves), that he found it necessary to preach separately to them and the Negroes.

In this prosperous state the mission continued for two or three years. There were two regular stations, namely, at Carmel and Emmaus, and preachings were kept on three other plantations, the Bogue, Island, and Mesopotamia. The number of catechumens amounted to four hundred, and that of the baptized to seventy-seven. More labourers being now required, some brethren arrived from Europe and North America in 1757 and 1759. But differing in opinion from their predecessors, and conceiving that the Negroes had been too hastily admitted to baptism, they treated them with greater strictness, and prolonged the time of the probation of the catechumens. This discouraged the poor slaves; many of them withdrew and even absented themselves from the public preaching; the harmony of the missionaries was interrupted and their zeal in the cause paralyzed. In 1759 brother Caries returned to Europe with brother Nath. Seidel, who had been sent over on a visitation, whose endeavours to revive the sinking cause were but partially successful; and several years elapsed before the mission recovered the detriment it had sustained.

Amidst these disheartening circumstances, it was an encouragement to the missionaries to find, that none of the slaves belonging to the five plantations, where they had regularly preached the gospel, were implicated in the rebellion of the Negroes in 1760. On the contrary, they were often in danger of being surprised by the rebels, till the latter were driven to seek an asylum in the woods and mountains.

In 1764, and the following years, the prospect again assumed a brighter appearance. Brother Frederic Schlegel, having arrived in order to take the general superintendence of the mission, was enabled, by divine grace, to restore harmony among the missionaries, and reanimate their drooping zeal. This had the effect that those Negroes, who had formerly been baptized, returned, and the smothered embers of the divine life in their souls were rekindled, so that the missionaries could employ some of them as assistants in preaching to their countrymen. By degrees the number of their hearers increased, and they found opportunities of declaring the gospel in some new places, and even of visiting the Negroes who live in the mountains. In the year 1767 one hundred and thirty-one were admitted to holy baptism, and the following year very nearly the same number.

After the decease of brother Schlegel, who entered into rest in 1770, the promising revival in this mission received a fresh check. The eagerness of the Negroes to hear the gospel subsided, and even some of the baptized relapsed into paganism. It ought here to be mentioned, that the labours of the missionaries were, through necessity, almost wholly restricted to the slaves belonging to a few plantations. In subsequent years an oppressive scarcity of provisions, and in 1778 fears of an hostile attack tended still further to impede the progress of the work.

Things remained in this languishing state for several succeeding years. Even at the Bogue, which still presented the greatest field for usefulness, the auditory seldom consisted of more than sixty people, and never amounted to a hundred. Consequently the annual addition to the church, by new converts from the heathen, was very small. Nothing could have encouraged the missionaries to remain at their post, but the consideration, that in the sight of God one human soul is of infinite value.

The insalubrity of the climate exposed them to frequent indispositions and often rendered a change of missionaries necessary. Thus brother Samuel Church, who, from the year 1787, had, with great faithfulness, superintended the affairs of this mission, found himself necessitated to return to England in 1792.

Brother Nathaniel Brown and his wife, on their voyage from Philadelphia to Jamaica, in 1797, were captured by a French privateer off Cape Nicola Mole in St. Domingo, and carried to Jean Rabel. They were kept prisoners for a fortnight, but treated with great civility, and, after due examination, set at liberty and suffered to proceed. An American merchant procured them a passport from the governor, and on the 7th of August they sailed with an American brig, which was engaged as a flag of truce, and in a few hours reached the Mole. Proceeding under convoy with several vessels, they arrived at Kingston, in Jamaica, on the 4th of September. During their stay in this town they experienced much kindness from the methodists, especially from the Rev. Mr. Fish.

The slow progress of this mission was still further impeded, about this time, by the rebellion of the maroons (slaves, who have eloped from their masters and live in the mountains, where they occupy several villages,) and the consequent introduction of martial law. Tranquillity was disturbed, all business was at a stand, and every person obliged to bear arms. From the last, however, the missionaries were exempted; and their places of abode were at a considerable distance from the theatre of these disturbances. They were likewise preserved from those depredations and murders which were committed by the runaway Negroes in 1798. And, what more particularly excited their gratitude, was that they observed a greater attention to the gospel in many of the slaves.

About this time some gentlemen in London, who had considerable possessions in this island, applied to the Brethren for one or more missionaries, to be sent out for the special purpose of instructing the Negroes belonging to their plantations, taking upon themselves their entire maintenance so as not to trench upon the general fund, the resources of which were barely sufficient to defray the expenses of the more promising fields cultivated by the Brethren. In order to meet the wishes of these gentlemen, the brethren Joseph Jackson (who was born in this island, his father having formerly laboured in this mission), and Thos. Ellis, and their wives, went in the spring of 1800 to Jamaica. On their arrival they found most of the resident missionaries ailing. Brother Howel and his wife were gone to North America for the recovery of their health, and brother Brown, after the decease of his wife, had returned to Pennsylvania. The services of the new missionaries, therefore, were immediately needed in the old settlements; and in this they acquiesced the more readily as the requisite arrangements for their accommodation had not yet been made in those places for which they were properly destined.

In subsequent years appearances became rather more hopeful, and the attendance of the Negroes, especially at Union and Elim (two new stations), was encouraging. Noticing the celebration of the anniversary of this mission in 1804, it being fifty years since its commencement, our brethren remark: "Though we cannot exult over a very abundant harvest of souls which these fifty years have produced, or even over present prospects, yet we find sufficient cause of gratitude to the Lord, for having preserved a seed in Jamaica also, which in his own good time may grow up into a rich harvest. It appears from the church register, that from the commencement of this mission, to the present date, nine hundred and thirty-eight Negroes have been baptized."

A few years after the mission sustained a very serious loss by the departure of brother Joseph Jackson, who fell asleep in Jesus, on December 9th, 1808, in the fortieth year of his age. The loss of such a man was the more to be deplored, as his natural and acquired endowments, joined to great urbanity of manners, and fervent zeal in the Lord's service, qualified him for more extensive usefulness in the church of the brethren.

The time for which the missionaries had long waited and fervently prayed, seemed now to have arrived, when the gospel would run and be glorified even in Jamaica. A greater desire was evidently excited among the Negroes to become savingly acquainted with the truths of Christianity. They attended the preachings in greater numbers, and evinced more earnestness in seeking to attain a right understanding of what they heard. For the attainment of this end the missionaries found a regulation, which they made in 1812, very useful, in meeting their people, especially the catechumens, in classes. Concerning this they remark: "It is pleasing to see the eagerness with which the Negroes come to this meeting. We are chiefly occupied with asking questions and explaining texts of scripture. They are all anxious that they may not come behind in proper answers, and, therefore, never stay away but from urgent necessity. We find that this mode of instruction makes a more lasting impression upon their minds than a regular sermon."

Among the new people, who about this time sought for instruction in Christian doctrine, was a Mahomedan, who had come twelve miles to visit the missionary. He introduced himself by saying: "Massa, I would have you know that I want to come to you to be baptized. I am a Mahomedan, and in my country we also believe in Moses. But I think my faith is now old and not the right one; I wish to come to Jesus Christ; I have one wife, and she is of the same mind. We have prayers together; and always pray to Jesus Christ. Did we not live so far off, we should have come before now and begged you to baptize us."

October 4th, 1812, a violent hurricane, followed in a few days by a smart shock of an earthquake, which continued half a minute, did very considerable damage in the island, and plunged the Negroes into great distress, as all their provision-grounds were destroyed. Brother Lang, in a letter dated Carmel, March 15th, 1813, writes: "Whenever we visit them in their huts they cry out, "Massa, hunger kill we;' and indeed they look so lean and emaciated, that we cannot behold them without pity. It will be two months before the plantain and Indian corn become fit for use. Were it not for our coffee planters, who, when coffee fell so much in price, planted plenty of a certain fruit, growing in the ground, which the storm cannot carry away, the poor people would absolutely be in danger of starving."

In June, 1815, brother Ward and his wife arrived from England, having been appointed for the service of this mission. Soon after their arrival they took the charge of the instruction of the Negroes on Island and Windsor estates, and fixed on Williamsfield as the most convenient place for their residence. On Island there were some baptized Negroes, the gospel having been occasionally preached there for many years, but those belonging to Windsor were ignorant heathen. The difference between them was striking, and appeared even in their manners and customs. The missionary soon found that his labours in these places were attended with the divine blessing. His auditories were, in general, large and very attentive, and many desired more special instruction, that they might be prepared for receiving holy baptism. The endeavours of the missionaries at Carmel were equally successful. Brother Lang writes: "The number of our hearers is on the increase, and the preaching of the gospel evinces its power on the hearts of the Negroes, which also appears in their moral conduct. Some walk in true fellowship of spirit with our Saviour, and have received the assurance of the forgiveness of their sins; others are mourning on account of sin, and seeking salvation in Jesus. Of the latter class there are about two hundred. One Sabbath, lately, a Negro from an estate, about fifteen miles from Carmel, brought me a stick, marked with seven notches, each notch denoting ten Negroes, informing me that there were so many Negroes on that estate engaged in praying to the Lord. About twenty of them attend divine worship at Peru: they are all unbaptized, but desirous of receiving holy baptism. The awakening spreads, and we entertain hopes that our Saviour will now gather a rich harvest in Jamaica."

Of the new stations, Elim and Peru were the most flourishing. The attornies and overseers on these estates, no less than the proprietors in England, promoted the endeavours of the missionaries by every means in their power. This indeed was now the case on all the plantations.

In the spring of 1816, however, some gentlemen endeavoured to obstruct the work, and for a short time intimidated the Negroes, so that the preachings were less numerously attended. Complaints were even lodged against the missionaries before the governor, but being unsupported by evidence, he was too just to condemn them without proof. And as an application on their part to be heard in their defence was not attended to, they determined to be quiet and commit their cause to God. In a little while the storm subsided and they could undisturbedly continue their labours.

The situation at the Bogue being, on several accounts, unfavourable for a missionary settlement, a new house and other necessary buildings were erected at a short distance from the former. To this place, which they called Eden, the missionaries removed in the summer of 1816. Here, and at the three stations of Mesopotamia, Carmel and Williamsfield, they continued their labours for the conversion of the Negroes. Besides this they preached regularly on the plantations of Elim, Peru, Union, Two-mile-wood, Island and Windsor.

SECTION III.

Antigua.

The missionaries residing in St. Thomas had long directed their attention to those islands in the West Indies, which belonged to the crown of England, hoping to find means of preaching the gospel also in them. The paucity of their number, however, and the frequent deaths which occurred among them, rendered this benevolent design abortive for a considerable time. At length, in 1756, brother Samuel Isles, who had spent eight years in St. Thomas, went to Antigua. On his arrival he waited on the governor, and showed him the act which had been passed in 1749 in favour of the Brethren. Some gentlemen patronized him, giving him permission to preach on their plantations. The following year he had the pleasure of performing the first baptismal transaction in this island on a Negro woman. In the sequel proposals were made to him for building a place of worship for the Negroes. This was effected in 1761, on a piece of ground, in the town of St. John's, bought for the purpose of forming a missionary establishment.

For several years the progress of the work was rather slow. Brother Isles and his two assistants, John Bennet and William Lister, continued to preach the gospel wherever a door was opened. On the one hand they met with no remarkable opposition, and on the other they saw no very striking effects attend their labours. Samuel Isles finished his race in 1764, having spent eight years in the service of this mission, during which period only thirty-six Negroes had been baptized. His successors did not relax in their endeavours, but sowed the seed of the gospel, in hopes of a fruitful harvest at some future period, for as yet the prospect was very discouraging, their congregation in St. John's having been reduced to fourteen members, and few of the heathen showing any inclination to attend the church.

This was the unpromising state of things when brother Brown arrived there from North America in May 1769. It pleased the Sovereign Lord of his vineyard to crown the zealous exertions of this missionary with signal success. Imbibing a measure of the spirit of his divine master, Brown was not content with addressing the Negroes in public, but followed them into their huts, and in private conversation earnestly and affectionately entreated them to attend to the things belonging to their peace. Besides performing the regular services in the town, he preached on two plantations in the country. The auditories increased; many heathen were converted, and in less than two years the baptized amounted to upwards of eighty. These invited their friends and acquaintances to go with them to church, and many, who came at first from mere curiosity, were by degrees so powerfully awakened, that they never absented themselves except in cases of the most urgent necessity.

This increase of their congregation rendered the enlargement of the chapel necessary. On this occasion the Christian Negroes, in a very pleasing manner, evidenced the influence of the gospel on their minds. When they came to the meetings, on week-day evenings, each brought a few stones or other materials with him. A baptized Negro, who was a mason, with the help of a few others, did all the masonry, and others did the carpenter's work, and completed the whole building in their free hours, after their daily tasks were done. And those, who could not assist in the labour, provided victuals for the workmen.

Difficulties were not wanting. The brethren, who had hitherto assisted brother Brown, were obliged to leave the island on account of ill health, and brother Ben. Brookshaw, who arrived there in 1771, and whose qualifications for the work were of the most promising kind, was called home by the Lord the following March; and as sister Brown likewise departed this life, her husband was for several months left quite alone.

In 1772 they suffered from a calamity of a more public nature. The island was visited by a violent hurricane, which did great damage, threw down one of the houses on the mission-settlement and considerably injured the rest. By the mercy of God the chapel, in which the missionaries and many Negroes had taken refuge, remained standing.

This calamity, however, appeared to make a salutary impression on the Negroes, teaching them the importance of knowing that Lord who is "a hiding place from the wind and a covert from the tempest." A new awakening arose among the slaves, which, like a fire from the Lord, spread in every direction. The auditories at the mission-chapel increased every year; so that in 1775 the number of the stated hearers amounted to two thousand; and not a month elapsed without an addition to the church of ten or twenty by baptism.

The missionaries therefore found it necessary, not only to erect a new and more spacious place of worship in St. John's, but also to endeavour to obtain a second establishment, in some other part of the island, in order, more especially, to accommodate those Negroes who lived at a distance from the town. The building of the new chapel was completed in 1773, and the following year they purchased a piece of ground called Bailey-hill, at no great distance from the town of Falmouth, and in the neighbourhood of several plantations, on which many of their converts resided.

In 1778 a severe famine prevailed, which plunged the Negroes into the greatest distress; many were found lying quite exhausted in the fields, and not a few perished with hunger. Some managers were so cruel as to give to the cattle the food, which the proprietors had ordered for their slaves. Contagious diseases followed, and thefts and robberies became frequent, whereby many industrious Negroes lost all their little property. Under these heavy circumstances the power of divine grace was strikingly exhibited in the conduct of the Christian Negroes. They not only refrained from all unlawful means of helping themselves, but bore their sufferings with exemplary patience, never resenting the injuries done them, nor taking revenge on those who robbed them. One of them, when returning from his work in the evening, and finding that thieves had been in his house, said, with a very placid mien: "Well, they have not been able to rob me of my greatest treasure, the grace of my Saviour. They are more to be pitied than I am."

The situation of Bailey-hill having been found very inconvenient, on account of the great acclivity of the hill, the missionaries were glad to meet with a more convenient place at no great distance. Thither they removed in 1782, and called it Gracehill. Their congregations here and in St. John's now amounted to two thousand and sixty-nine baptized Negroes, and with the catechumens and regular hearers nearly to double that number.

The external circumstances of the mission continued rather difficult. Hard labour, sickness, famine and depredations were trials, which the Christian Negroes shared in common with others. Frequent apprehensions of a hostile attack from the French, who took the island in 1782, but restored it to Britain the following year, and the necessary preparations of defence had an injurious influence. The baptized Negroes were exposed to persecution and oppressive treatment, both from their heathen fellow-slaves and from some of the managers. A Negro, who accompanied his master on a voyage, was captured by the French and carried to Gaudaloupe, where he suffered severe imprisonment. His Christian behaviour drew the attention of the jailor; who, on learning that the prisoner was baptized, gave him more liberty, and even promoted his return to Antigua.

One of the greatest trials the missionaries occasionally felt, was the removal of some of their converts to other islands, where they had no opportunity of hearing the gospel. In such cases, however, they had frequently the pleasure to hear that the Christian Negroes kept together, and by prayer and mutual edification, encouraged each other to remain faithful to their baptismal engagements. By these means they often proved a blessing to their unconverted countrymen, and it occurred more than once that some of the latter, when transported to Antigua, immediately sought fellowship with our brethren.

After the restoration of peace, in 1783, the Negroes evinced a growing desire to hear the gospel. Baptismal transactions were numerous and frequent. In St. John's sixty adults were, by this sacred rite, in one day embodied in the church; and that congregation received, in one year, an accession of upwards of four hundred new members; and the congregation at Gracehill was, within the same period, increased by more than three hundred persons. The number of apostates was comparatively small.

These very large additions rendered it necessary to celebrate the Lord's Supper in two divisions at St. Johns. For as yet the missionaries had been unsuccessful in their endeavours to obtain a piece of ground, in a convenient situation for a third settlement. To obviate, in some degree, the difficulty experienced by many of the Negroes, who lived at a considerable distance, in attending the regular service in the settlements, the missionaries preached at stated times on several adjacent plantations. This measure was in general approved by the proprietors and managers. In one place a Negro, one of the native assistants, built a chapel at his own expense, sufficiently large to accommodate four hundred hearers.

In 1790 this mission sustained a very heavy loss by the removal of brother Brown. This missionary, who for twenty-two years had laboured with indefatigable zeal in this part of the Lord's vineyard, and been instrumental in the conversion of many hundred Negroes, began to feel a declension, not only of his bodily health, but also of his mental faculties. His wife, likewise, besides general debility, had entirely lost her sight, and thus was incapacitated from attending to the female Negroes, and from rendering any other assistance to the mission. They, therefore, retired to Bethlehem in North America. Brother Samuel Watson succeeded Brown in the superintendence of the mission; but was removed to a better world in 1792, in the 47th year of his age, after having, with exemplary faithfulness, served the cause of God in this island upwards of sixteen years. More than two thousand Europeans and Negroes joined the solemnities of his funeral, as the last proof they could give of the esteem which all ranks attached to his memory. His place was supplied by brother Henry Christian Tschirpe, hitherto minister of the Brethren's congregation in Berlin.

In the night between the 18th and 19th of August 1795, a violent hurricane, accompanied with tremendous thunder and a severe shock of an earthquake, raged, and did very considerable damage in the island. The fences and out-houses in the two missionary settlements were totally destroyed, and the dwelling-houses were much injured; but the missionaries gratefully acknowledged the goodness of God in protecting them from all personal hurt.

The following year they succeeded in accomplishing the long projected measure of forming a third settlement. They made a purchase of a small piece of ground in Old Road Town, lying near the coast, and at the distance of thirteen miles from each of the two other settlements. Having repaired an old house standing upon the premises, they used it both for a dwelling and a meeting-room, till a regular chapel could be built. This place received the name of Grace-bay; and brother J. F. Reichel and his wife removing thither early in 1797, it proved a great convenience to many Negroes, especially the aged and infirm. A congregation consisting of six hundred Christian Negroes, who had formerly belonged to St. John's or Gracehill, was immediately collected, and many, who had never been at church before, now began to attend the preaching of the gospel at this station, were solidly awakened by the Spirit of God, and joined the fellowship of the believers.

Many instances, evidencing the benign influence of the gospel on the sentiments and conduct of the Christian Negroes, and of the increasing esteem entertained for the Brethren's labours by most of the planters, continued to occur. The following, selected from a number of others, will serve to corroborate this assertion.

Richard, one of the native assistants, closed his earthly pilgrimage in his ninety-ninth year. Even in that advanced age he was very lively and active, and much respected by his proprietor. A rather singular circumstance paved the way for his conversion. He and another slave once endeavoured to promote a dance, in order to keep the Negroes from going to church. But this scheme was defeated, for all the rest declared "they preferred going to church." This irritated Richard and his comrade. They, however, resolved to go to the meeting to see and hear for themselves; when the Lord opened their hearts, so that they both seriously attended to the things which were spoken by the missionary.

Joseph, another Negro, who died about this time, had been baptized in the church of England, but afterwards joined the Brethren. Having obtained his freedom, he engaged as valet to a gentleman. His master often entered into familiar conversation with him, and once addressed him thus: "Joseph, you are a fool to be always going to Gracehill, for you were baptized in the English church." The Negro replied: "I was a fool when I gave the clergyman money to baptize me, though he never instructed me in the doctrine of salvation; this I have been taught in Gracehill. You, sir, are a great gentleman and a Christian, and yet you never go to church; but I will tell you, I would not change with you, though I am but a poor Negro. Me you cannot hinder from going to Gracehill; but I entreat you, sir, do not hinder your slaves."

The happy departure of a slave terminated his sufferings in this life. Being lame, and consequently useless, he had to endure extreme misery. His black brethren esteemed him highly on account of his faith and love to Jesus, and would gladly have helped him, but his unmerciful master would not permit it. He was found lying dead on a rock, and the Negroes were not allowed to make a coffin for him, even at their own expense.

Inhuman behaviour of this kind, however, became more and more rare: on the contrary, the planters, in general, knew how to appreciate the worth of their Christian slaves. A gentleman, having lost a Negro of this description, requested the missionary to hold a funeral discourse for him, and with tears in his eyes added: "His equal for fidelity and every other virtue, is scarce to be found in the whole island; and if Almighty God does open the gates of heaven to any man, it will surely be to this old and venerable Negro."

Another gentleman once declared "I esteem and love the Brethren, because they preach the gospel in its purity, and in a truly apostolical manner. My regard for them is founded on the experience of thirty-six years. I well remember the time, when not only white people were afraid of the Negroes, but when even the latter could not trust each other, and murders were quite common. But, when the missionaries began to preach the gospel, it displayed its power, and changed the hearts of the slaves."

To the same effect another planter expressed himself, remarking, "Formerly we could hardly procure ropes enough on a Monday, for the purpose of punishing those slaves who had committed crimes on Sunday; twenty, thirty, and even more were frequently hung; but since the gospel has been preached to them, scarcely two are hung in a whole year, and these for the most part are strange Negroes, who have not been long in the island."

In process of time the missionaries observed, with grief, that the eagerness of the Negroes to hear and obey the gospel was rather declining; yet they still found abundant cause of acknowledging the goodness of God in making them the happy instruments of removing the galling fetters of sin from the heart of many a poor slave. And though in their attendance on the means of grace they did not always exhibit that earnestness which their teachers so much desired, yet on Sundays and festival seasons the auditories were crowded. Thus the congregation of St. John's, on Easter Monday 1804, consisted of nearly three thousand people; and during the preceding week they had, besides their regular evening services in the chapel, held meetings on thirty-four estates in the neighbourhood of that settlement for contemplating the passion scenes of our Saviour.

Towards the close of 1802, the island was visited by a very dangerous epidemic, which chiefly affected the white inhabitants, and carried off several hundred persons. At that time, however, death did not enter the dwellings of the missionaries. But some months before they had lost one of their number, brother Luke Turner. His departure was the more afflictive to his fellow-labourers, as he was still in the prime of life, and had been only two years on the island. But in that short period he had given sufficient proofs of his zeal in the Lord's service, and by his modest and unassuming character gained the esteem and love of all who knew him. The physician, with tears in his eyes, bore testimony to this. Addressing one of the brethren he said: "For these many months, sir, we have not lost one white patient. However, your friend is best prepared for it, though he cannot speak. His very countenance shows the peace of his heart and the rest of his soul. He will be rewarded in heaven. Look at his Christian composure, his end will be as his life, easy and mild. I pity you, that you should lose a man of such a character."

The first months of the year 1805 were a period of much anxiety, as an invasion from the French was almost daily expected. The presence of their fleet in these seas kept the inhabitants constantly on the alert. The colony was under martial law, and all business at a stand. On March the 10th the town of St. John's was suddenly thrown into the utmost consternation, and people were flying in all directions, a report being circulated that the enemy had landed on Johnson's point, and were marching to the town. This fortunately proved a false alarm; and the island was preserved in peace.

In 1808 a trial of a more private nature, but truly distressing to the cause in which they were engaged, befel the missionaries. Nearly all of them suffered from severe illnesses, and that much about the same time, which rendered the duty of those who remained tolerably well, doubly arduous; and, if the Lord had not made their strength equal to their day, the regular service of their numerous congregations must have been still more interrupted than it was. On this occassion brother J. C. Schnepf closed his useful life; and brother Sautter and his wife went to North America, for the recovery of his health. Through the mercy of God the change of air proved beneficial, and they returned the following year.

It had long been the wish of the missionaries to commence a regular school with the children, but their state of servitude had hitherto put an insurmountable barrier in the way. All they could do, therefore, consisted in holding a separate meeting with the children on Sundays, and occasionally also on other days. These meetings were frequently attended by several hundreds, and even by a thousand young people. On these occasions the missionaries adopted the catechetical mode of instruction, giving them texts of Scripture and short hymns to learn, which they repeated at the next meeting. The prejudices, entertained by most planters, against the Negroes learning to read, which had always been the most formidable impediment, began gradually to subside. The missionaries gladly availed themselves of this favourable change, and in 1810 commenced a regular Sunday-school at St. John's, adopting the Lancasterian method of instruction. They were kindly assisted by a worthy young man, belonging to the Methodist society.

The school was opened on the 3d of June with eighty scholars, but their number in a short time increased to seven hundred. The parents of the children, no less than the children themselves, received this instruction with joy and gratitude. The progress of the latter both surprized and delighted their teachers. They remark, that the Negroes evinced a great regard and love for the Word of God, and used to steal time from their hours of rest to learn to read, in order to peruse the holy Scriptures. This rendered the present of Bibles and Testaments, sent to them by the worthy British and Foreign Bible Society, doubly valuable.

At Gracehill, where the duties of the missionaries in preaching in the chapel and on several plantations left them no time on the Lord's day for keeping school, they endeavoured to obviate this disadvantage in some measure, by devoting one day in the week to the instruction of the young. The school commenced on the estate of Mr. G., a gentleman who had always shown himself a zealous promoter of the intellectual and moral improvement of his Negroes. It began with sixty scholars, who attended three hours in the forenoon, and the same time in the afternoon.

The situation of Grace-bay being rather unhealthy, the missionaries made a purchase of a small estate on the Manchineel hill, to which they removed in 1811. The congregation belonging to that place, including the catechumens and children, then consisted of twelve hundred and sixteen persons.

Very early in the morning of October 1, 1812, the missionaries were roused from sleep by tremenduous gusts of wind, the prelude to a hurricane which raged with unabating violence for several hours, accompanied with heavy thunder and vivid lightning, and a smart shock of an earthquake. Considerable damage was done to the fences, out-houses, and roofs of the three settlements. Happily, however, the chapels and dwelling-houses remained standing, and none of the missionary family suffered any personal injury. The whole year was a very heavy period. Owing to the dryness of the season and the war with America, provisions rose to an exorbitant price; and Indian corn, the common food of the Negroes, was scarcely to be procured at any price. Famine and disease prevailed among whites and blacks. More than two hundred of the congregation at St. John's finished their earthly career.

But, amidst all difficulties, the faith and courage of the missionaries were sustained and animated by repeated proofs that God not only cared for their temporal wants, but most graciously prospered their exertions for the conversion of the Negroes. If at times they found cause to lament over the luke-warmness, and even the actual apostacy of some of their people, their joy was so much the greater, when, through the faithful care of the good Shepherd, some of these strayed sheep returned to the fold. Among these was the Negro Mich. Burke, who had been baptized in 1791, but some years afterwards left the fellowship of believers. At length, after many wanderings, he came back to the missionaries, and, having given satisfactory evidence of true repentance and a real change of mind, was re-admitted to the congregation in the beginning of 1812. Now he could not find words to bemoan his wicked conduct, or to extol the mercy of our Saviour in again awakening him from the sleep of sin, and not suffering him to be eternally lost. On one occasion he said: "Oh! how much happiness have I lost, which I cannot now regain. Through the tender mercy of the good Shepherd I am brought back to the fold, and plucked as a brand out of the burning; but I have lost much. Tell my brethren and sisters to take warning by me, and not to depart from our Saviour and his people, but hold fast the grace which they have received. O tell every one from me, to hold fast what they have got." About midsummer he departed this life, relying on the grace of God in Christ Jesus.

SECTION IV.

Barbadoes.

The island to which, in the order of time, the Brethren next directed their attention, was Barbadoes. Two brethren went thither in 1765; but one of them departed this life almost immediately, and the other withdrew from their connexion. A third, who was sent to supply the place of the first, in a short time followed him into eternity. Thus the undertaking was suspended till 1767, when Brother Benjamin Brukshaw, a native of Cheshire, resolved to go thither by himself, and renew the mission. He arrived in the island in May, and immediately waited on the president of the council and the resident clergy, all of whom approved of his design, and wished him God's blessing for his labours. These he began at Bridgetown, preaching to the Negroes and visiting them on their plantations. Many proprietors favoured the undertaking, encouraged their slaves to hear the gospel, and attended themselves.

In August brother J. Bennet came from North America to assist in the work. As the number of their hearers was constantly increasing, they purchased a small house and fitted it up both for dwellings and a meeting-place. The Negroes, not only attended divine service on the Lord's-day, but frequently visited the missionaries during the week; so that they were often employed from morning till night. The gospel found entrance into the hearts of some, and on the 10th of September 1768 a Negro woman was baptized, being the first fruit of this mission. Soon after five others were added to the church by this holy ordinance. Many planters, perceiving the good effects following the labours of the missionaries, invited them to preach on their estates.

This encouraging prospect, however, did not long continue. It soon appeared, that many Negroes had attended the preaching from mere curiosity; these, therefore, as soon as the novelty ceased, intermitted their attendance. Among the few stated hearers little of vital godliness was to be discovered; so that the missionaries found little freedom to admit any to baptism.

After the removal of brother Brukshaw, who in 1771 went to Antigua, and the decease of brother Bennet in 1772, the mission was involved in very distressing circumstances. Pecuniary and other difficulties oppressed it from without, and dissensions among the missionaries themselves disturbed its internal peace, and injured the work in which they were engaged. At length only one missionary was left on the island; and thus, neither the public preaching of the gospel, nor the instruction of the few baptized and the catechumens, could be properly attended to.

The following year brother John Angerman arrived and renewed the work with zeal and courage, and not wholly without success; but he finished his earthly career in 1775. His fellow-labourer continued, amidst many difficulties, to sow the seed of the Word, in hopes of a plentiful harvest at some future period, for as yet the prospect was far from encouraging.

About this time the brethren occupied two stations. Brother Meder and his wife lived in a hired house near Bridgetown, and another missionary and his wife, together with an unmarried brother, resided in the mission-house in the parish of St. Thomas. In both these places they suffered severely from the hurricane, which raged in October 1780. Their houses and out-buildings in both places were thrown down. In vain did they seek an asylum in other houses, for they shared the same fate. With the utmost difficulty they escaped being buried under the ruins, and were obliged to weather the storm in the open air, without shelter of any kind, and lost nearly all their provisions and property. The mission was thus thrown into new difficulties.*

No very promising change took place for several subsequent years. Few Negroes, except those who had formerly been baptized, and who did not exceed twenty in number, attended the preaching. They were indeed ready enough to assent to the truth of what the missionaries told them; but secret enmity to the gospel lurked in their hearts, and they appeared to be in an awful manner under the influence of the power of darkness. The planters also, with few exceptions, now changed their opinion and disapproved of their slaves becoming Christians.

In the year 1790 the prospect became more cheering. The auditories increased, and sometimes amounted to a hundred and fifty: a small number indeed, when compared with the crowded congregations in Antigua and the Danish West India islands; but in Barbadoes even this increase was hailed with feelings of joy and gratitude. Their zeal and hope were still more enlivened by observing the saving power of the gospel in several heathen Negroes, who were admitted to baptism, and the consistent conduct of those who had long been members of the church. By degrees more of the planters became favourably disposed towards the mission, and it was treated with respect by the government.

The situation of the mission-house in the parish of St. Thomas had long been considered as an obstacle to the prosperity of the mission. For some years the dwellings of our brethren had been in a ruinous condition, and the situation was unhealthy, as there was no proper road leading to it, and inconvenient, as the members of the congregation resided mostly at a considerable distance. Measures were, therefore, taken in 1794 to obtain a new place for their residence. This was accomplished by the purchase of a small estate, containing four acres of ground, with a large house upon it. In July brother Hofeman and his wife moved thither, and the other missionaries soon followed. They found it a very eligible situation, being in the midst of populous estates, and much nearer to the town than their former residence. They called it Sharon.

Brother Hodgson and his wife, who had for some time served the mission in St. Kitts, receiving in 1797 an appointment to Barbadoes, on their way to that island from Antigua must have been lost at sea, as no intelligence was ever received, either of them, or of their fellow-passengers on board the packet in which they sailed.

The following year brother Waller and his wife and sister Mary Grant, on their passage from Bristol to Barbadoes, suffered shipwreck off Kinsale in Ireland, the vessel striking on a rock, about two hundred yards from the shore. They were for four hours in constant fear of being swallowed up by the waves, till, by the ebbing of the tide, they found it practicable to reach the land. Scarcely, however, had they escaped the fury of the water, when a gang of robbers, with knives and hatchets, rushed upon the whole ship's company, threatening their lives, and plundering the wreck. Fortunately a party of soldiers at that instant made their appearance, and fired upon the depredators, by which five of them were killed. During this horrid scene the passengers effected their escape, but could save nothing of their property, except the clothes they had on. The ship was entirely lost. The methodist minister at Kinsale, and several members of his congregation, showed the missionaries much kindness, and supplied them with the needful articles of clothing. In January 1799 they sailed in a vessel from Cork, and had a very pleasant and expeditious voyage to Barbadoes.

Since the building of the new chapel at Sharon the missionaries had in general pretty large and attentive auditories, and a gradual increase to the number of baptized, which in 1800 amounted to upwards of one hundred and sixty. In succeeding years no change of any moment occurred in this mission. Compared with the labours of our missionaries in other islands, their exertions here were crowned with little success; but knowing that "their judgment was with the Lord and their reward with their God," and considering the value of one human soul, if gained for Christ by the preaching of the gospel, they were encouraged to proceed in the path of duty.

In 1812 an event occurred, which threw all the inhabitants of the island into the utmost consternation, and which was occasioned by the eruption of mount Soufriere. The reader will find an interesting account of this phenomenon, as far as its effects were felt in Barbadoes, in the following letter, written by brother Ganson, one of the missionaries:

"Having had no rain for a long time, April 30th in the evening, about ten o'clock, the sky looked extremely dark, and we expected heavy rain in the night, which being much wanted, created great joy. However, on May 1st, early in the morning, a most extraordinary and awful phenomenon presented itself, to the great alarm of all the inhabitants. At day-break about five o'clock, the horizon to the south appeared remarkably light. At six thick clouds had covered the whole sky, from whence issued, not indeed the long expected fruitful rain, but showers of a substance resembling dust, or ashes, but which were particles of volcanic matter. It now grew so excessively dark, that the like had never been seen nor heard of before. It reminded me of that awful darkness, when all nature seemed to shudder, and the sun hid his face at the expiration of the Son of God upon the cross. In this state of awful uncertainty, we looked up to our Almighty Father and Preserver, and he filled our hearts with peace. At seven o'clock our whole family was called together, and, during a solemn feeling of our helplessness, we exhorted each other to faith and trust in God our Redeemer, offered up fervent prayer for ourselves and our fellow-men, and were richly comforted by a sense of his divine presence. This inexplicable and utter darkness continued till about half-past twelve o'clock. About one, a little light from the sun's rays appeared, to the great comfort of every human being in the island. About three o'clock many Negroes from far and near assembled together in our church, forming a large congregation, to whom a discourse was delivered on the text, "The works of his hands are verity and judgment; all his commandments are sure;" (Psalm cxi. 7.) concluded with fervent prayer.

* The hurricane lasted twenty-four hours. Trees and plantations were destroyed; churches and many houses thrown down; and several thousand persons lost their lives.

"So great was the consternation of all the inhabitants, that the large church of Bridgetown was, on this awful day, so crowded, as hardly to contain the people, who, with lanterns in their hands, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, took refuge in the house of prayer. The fall of dust lay about three or four inches thick on even ground, and we have been troubled with clouds of it, raised by the high winds, which have prevailed since that day. We have as yet had no rain, so that every thing is dried up; the poor cattle have nothing to eat, and to all appearance both man and beast will have much to suffer. All kinds of provisions are extremely dear.

"May 6th a member of assembly from St. Vincent arrived here applying for succour. Our legislature met, and resolved to send a vessel with provisions, to the amount of two thousand pounds, which, considering the lamentable state in which this island is now left, was a noble proof of their humanity and fellow-feeling. May the Lord grant these remarkable events to be productive of good fruit in our hearts, that we may not only be alarmed at his judgments, but be in truth converted to him, in whom, though earth and heaven be dissolved, his children shall have eternal rest and peace."

By the protecting hand of God the missionaries were preserved from harm during the insurrection of the slaves, which broke out in April 1816, but was suppressed by a strong military force. They had the satisfaction to find that none of the Negroes belonging to their church had joined the rebels in their excesses and violence.

They experienced another merciful preservation during the hurricane, which in October 1817 raged with great violence in St. Lucia and other adjacent islands; for though several ships were stranded in the roads of Barbadoes, no damage was done in the island.

The conversion of the Negroes continued in general in the same gradual and less striking manner, which has all along characterized the progress of this mission.

SECTION V.

St. Kitts.

The missionaries of the Brethren in Antigua had received repeated invitations to extend their labours to the adjacent island of St. Kitt's.* Mr. Gardiner, who had a great number of Negroes on his estates, in a very urgent manner expressed his desire for their instruction in the truths of Christianity. In compliance with these wishes, the directors of the missions in 1777 dispatched the brethren Birkby and Gottwald, with their wives, to St. Kitts.

On their arrival they hired a house in the town of Basseterre. Here, and on one of Mr. Gardiner's estates, they regularly preached to the Negroes, who attended in considerable numbers, and by degrees several of them, becoming obedient to the doctrine of Christ, were added to the church by baptism. They also visited on some other plantations, and their testimony of Jesus did not remain unfruitful. Their undertaking was countenanced by most of the planters; and even during the attack and consequent capture of the island by the French in 1782, they neither received any personal injury, nor were molested in their missionary labours; on the contrary, the French commander assured them of his favour and protection.

The seed of the Word, sown in this island, was less rapid in its growth than in some other places, for in 1781 the converts scarcely exceeded forty; but the fruit was generally abiding, and exhibited a pleasing degree of maturity. The temporal condition of the Negroes was in many respects superior to the circumstances of the slaves in other islands. Among the converts were several free persons, and others were possessed of considerable property and very decent habitations.

In 1785 the missionaries purchased a small piece of ground, on which they erected the needful buildings. Hereby they were provided with greater conveniences for serving the Negroes with the word and ordinances of the gospel. The number of their hearers and converts increased. This gradually excited observation, and stimulated others to similar exertions. The clergymen in the town held lectures to the Negroes twice in the week, and the methodist preachers laboured with their accustomed activity. This, though it lessened the auditories of our missionaries, did not diminish the number of their converts. On the contrary, they increased so much in a few years, that it was found necessary to build a larger chapel. This was completed in 1789, the Christian Negroes not only assisting in the work by manual labour, but also aiding it by pecuniary contributions. On the day of the solemn opening of this new place of worship, eighteen persons were baptized, and three, who had belonged to other denominations, were admitted members of the Brethren's church. The baptized amounted to two hundred and seventy-nine, besides eighty catechumens.

A fire from the Lord was now kindled in this mission, which contined to burn in subsequent years, so that the number of those, who from the heart believed in our Saviour, was constantly increasing, and in a few years amounted to upwards of two thousand and five hundred. The chapel was crowded with attentive hearers, even on week days; and on the Lord's day, large companies were standing outside and devoutly listening to the words of eternal life. Many Negroes came from a considerable distance, and the overseers and managers encouraged the attendance of their slaves. The missionaries themselves diligently itinerated through the country, preaching on several estates; and this, no doubt, was one great cause of the success which rewarded their labours. The eagerness of the Negroes to be instructed was well accounted for by one of them in the following simple manner. His master asked him, why the Negroes went so often to the chapel of the Brethren, as their masters never attended divine service but on Sundays; the slave replied, "Aye, you, sir, have the Bible, which you may read as often as you please; we poor Negroes have not this treasure; and we have long led very wicked lives; but now God hath sent teachers to us, from whom we learn what our Saviour has suffered for sinners; and that he is willing to forgive our sins. Do you not think, sir, that this is a great benefit conferred on us, and that it ought to make our souls hunger after it!"

During the night preceding Easter Sunday, in 1792, the town of Basseterre was visited by a dreadful inundation. Many houses were swept away, and several lives lost. The missionaries were mercifully preserved, though their premises sustained considerable injury, and only two members of the congregation were drowned. Their chapel was the only place of worship fit for the performance of divine service.

A hurricane, which raged in August the following year, caused great destruction on their premises. It was next to a miracle that their dwelling-house was now totally demolished. The missionary family took refuge in the chapel, and, though all the spouts were blown down, and the building itself cracked several times, as if crushed by some immense weight falling upon it, they sustained no bodily injury.

Amidst these outward distresses the work of the Lord prospered. Divine service at Basseterre was often attended by very crowded auditories; and doors for preaching to the Negroes were opened to the missionaries on fifty plantations. At the close of 1794 the members of their congregation were one thousand four hundred and ninety-eight; and by the end of 1800 this number was increased to two thousand five hundred and sixty-nine.

In consequence of the contest between Great Britain and France provisions rose to an exorbitant price, which often reduced the Negroes to extreme want. And as the island was frequently threatened with hostile invasion, it was in 1803 found necessary to enrol a black corps to assist in its defence. The missionaries observed with deep regret, that the new mode of life, thus introduced among the Negroes, had an injurious influence on their spiritual course, and they neglected no seasonable opportunity for exhorting their converts to prayer and watchfulness, and steadfast reliance on God, their almighty Saviour.

The threatened invasion was mercifully averted for some time; but in March 1805 the enemy put his threats into execution. On the 5th of that month a French fleet, consisting of ten sail, hove in sight, and came into the road of Basseterre. This spread universal consternation through the town, and most of the inhabitants fled into the country. Our brethren however remained; and such was the confidence which their fellow citizens reposed in them, that many brought their most valuable property to them for security, and some even sought shelter for themselves in the church. The French General Balbot fixed his head-quarters in their neighbourhood, and stationed a guard of four men and a corporal at the entrance of the burying-ground.

* St. Kitt's is the name given to this island in the Reports of the missionary; English geographers call it St. Christopher.

Finding resistance would be vain, the council deputed some gentlemen to the French admiral and general, in order to capitulate. The terms of capitulation were in a short time agreed upon, and the enemy left the island after levying a contribution, burning five ships and a sloop, spiking the cannons, and demolishing the powder-magazines. Thus, by the mercy of God, tranquillity was restored in a few days, and our brethren, without having suffered any injury, could resume their missionary employments without fear or interruption.* Towards the close of the year 1806, brother C. F. Richter and his wife, and brother Eusebius Williams, arrived in St. Kitt's, in order to strengthen the hands of the old missionaries. But the Lord was pleased to remove the latter into eternal rest before the termination of another year. He died rather suddenly on the 12th of December, 1807, having the day before been seized with a paralytic affection, which lamed his right arm and both feet, and deprived him of the power of speech. His fellow-missionaries severely lamented their loss of him, for his amiable and affectionate disposition had procured him the esteem and love of all who knew him; and during the short period in which he served this mission, he had manifested an earnest desire and an ever wakeful zeal to promote the conversion of the Negroes, and their true welfare for time and eternity.

In 1813 the mission sustained another loss by the removal of brother George Ch. Schneller to England. Being in his 73d year, increasing infirmities induced him to retire from active service. He had spent thirty years in labouring for the conversion of the Negroes; namely, five years in Antigua, and twenty-five in St. Kitt's. After his return to Europe, he resided at the Brethren's settlement at Fairfield, near Manchester, where he finished his earthly pilgrimage, and entered into the joy of his Lord on September 15th, 1814. His brethren delineate his qualifications as a missionary in the following terms: "His inoffensive, unblamable deportment, and amiable and upright character, procured for him the esteem of all ranks, from the president to the meanest slave. In all his transactions, it was evident that he had a single eye to the glory of God, and the prosperity of the important work in which he was employed. His diligence and faithful attention to every part of his charge were most exemplary; and while, by his affability and kindness, he gained the love and confidence of the Negroes, he maintained that respect among them which was due to his station, and gave weight to his admonitions and to the exercise of proper discipline in the church.

For some years no striking occurrences marked the progress of this mission: those who laboured in it attended with persevering zeal to the instruction of the Negroes in the faith and practice of Christianity; and the vacancies occasioned by the removal of some into the land of pure delights, were soon supplied by other devoted servants of God, who accounted it an honour "to preach unto the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ." Their testimony did not return unto them void. In every year some believed, and were added to the church by baptism; and others finished their earthly career in hope of the glory of God, a hope grounded on their having in truth embraced the doctrine of Christ and his atonement.

From the reports the missionaries give of later years, it appears that their congregation rather diminished in number; a circumstance which probably was, in part at least, owing to the increasing exertions of other Christian denominations in the same noble work, and cannot, therefore, be considered as a real declension of religion in this island.

CHAPTER VI.

MISSION IN RUSSIAN ASIA.

In 1761 the Empress of Russia, Catharine the Great, issued an edict in favour of the Brethren, and at the same time signified her wish that they would form a settlement on the banks of the Wolga. A general synod of the Brethren's church being that year assembled at Marienborn, a resolution was taken to accept this gracious offer of her imperial majesty. The synod was the more readily disposed to engage in this undertaking, as it induced the hope that an opportunity might thus be afforded for propagating the gospel in the East, especially among those pagan tribes who inhabit the confines of Russia and Tartary.

The following year, therefore, five brethren went from Germany to St. Petersburg; and then proceeded to the banks of the Wolga. Having taken possession of a suitable tract of land, they began, with the assistance of some Russians, to erect the necessary buildings, to cultivate the land, and work at their trades. To this place they gave the name of Sarepta. It furnishes a strong proof of their courage, and still more of God's protection, that at a time when travellers were frequently robbed in these parts, and when many thousand Calmucs were encamped in their immediate neighbourhood, five defenceless persons, with only a few Cossacks, given them now and then as a guard, resided a whole year in this desert without suffering the slightest injury.

Sarepta lies near Czarizin, about two thousand miles from Petersburg, on the high road leading, by way of Astrachan, to Persia and the East Indies. The arrival in subsequent years of several companies of brethren and sisters, not only increased the number of inhabitants, but in a short period rendered it a very flourishing place. Its situation on a rivulet called Sarpa, near its confluence with the Wolga, led to the erection of mills; and the fertility of the soil amply rewarded their industry in agriculture, and occasioned the building of a small village, called Schoenbrun, near the settlement, for the accommodation of those families, who were employed in farming and horticulture. The discovery of a mineral spring, at the distance of about five English miles from the boundaries of Sarepta, proved an additional source of prosperity. Joachim Wier, M. D., the practising physician in the settlement, having analyzed the water of this spring, and found it beneficial in various diseases, submitted a dissertation on it to the Imperial College of Physicians, which met with their entire approbation. Sarepta in consequence received a great many visitors who stayed a longer or shorter time, either in the settlement or at the spa, for the use of the water. In some years the number of patients amounted to two or three hundred, among whom were persons of different nations and of high rank, governors of provinces, generals, and even princes with their retinues. This concourse of visitors, the subsequent arrival of several German colonists of the Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Roman Catholic communions, who erected villages on the banks of the Wolga, and its situation on the high road, greatly promoted the commercial interests of the place: so that it is now a very flourishing settlement, enjoying the countenance and protection of the Russian government and exciting the admiration of travellers; the more so, as it lies in the midst of a vast and nearly uninhabited territory.

The establishment of a flourishing colony, however, was not the primary object the Brethren had in view, when building Sarepta. They never considered their intention, in erecting this settlement, would be fully attained, unless it should be the means of facilitating their endeavours to propagate the gospel among the heathen, and serve as a place of rendezvous to those who might feel disposed to devote themselves to this important service in the East. In order to effect this, they endeavoured to form an acquaintance with the Calmucs in their neighbourhood, and to cultivate their friendship.

The Calmucs lead a pastoral life, roving from place to place, in quest of pasturage for their numerous flocks of sheep, cows, horses and camels; for they never till the ground nor build any villages, but reside in movable tents, called Kibitke. They are divided into four hordes or clans, viz. the Kohots, Soongars, Derbets and Torgots; and, though they are subject to the crown of Russia, are allowed to regulate their internal government, both civil and ecclesiastical, according to established usage, and to choose their own sovereign, besides whom they have many hereditary lords, or princes. Their religion is rank polytheism. They venerate one Supreme Being; but, besides him, believe in a great many inferior gods, who, according to their ideas, govern the world in rotation. They likewise pay divine honours to many thousand deified heroes called Burchans, whose number is yearly augmented by the deaths of holy persons. Those who are ambitious to obtain this honour, must be well versed in their sacred writings, repeat many prayers, avoid the killing of any creature, be charitable to the poor, and perform other good works. None but the priests can lay claim to this distinction after death, and on this account they are treated with very great respect. They are of different ranks, some being called gellons and others lamas. To the latter they pay almost divine honours. The Delai Lama, or grand Lama of Tibet, is the high priest, or the head of their ecclesiastical government. He is said never to die; and his name is continually invoked by the devotees of this superstition. The common people know of no other means of salvation than the prayers of their priests, which they purchase with rich offerings. They believe in the transmigration of the soul; whoever, therefore, dies in an unholy state, has to pass through several stages for his purification, before he can indulge the hope of finally becoming a burchan. Their temples are nothing else than movable tents, hung with very costly silk tapestry, superbly decorated with gold, silver and precious stones, and ornamented with the most grotesque representations of their idols. In many of their religious opinions and rites they bear a strong resemblance to the Roman Catholics. For instance, in the use of the rosary in prayer, the celibacy of the clergy, the observance of fasts, the meritoriousness of good works, the masses for the dead, &c. Their sacred books contain many sound principles and moral instructions; but they are mixed with the most ridiculous stories. Many passages appear to have been borrowed from the Christian doctrines; but, to suit their own superstitious notions, they are greatly distorted. Our brethren frequently detected them in endeavours so to interpret the history, doctrine and miracles of Christ, as to make them coincide with their own legends and absurd mythology.

* Per. Acct. Vol. III. p. 393—395.

On either side of the Wolga are extensive uninhabited plains, called steppes, overgrown with very long grass. In these steppes numerous hordes of Calmucs annually pitch their tents, for a longer or shorter period; and as many of them often fixed themselves near Sarepta, the inhabitants soon formed an acquaintance with them. They expressed much pleasure at the building of the settlement, frequently attended divine service with marks of respect and devotion, and behaved with great civility. At first they occasioned some trouble, by pitching their tents on the land belonging to Sarepta; but their princes, or chans, interfered, ordered justice to be done to the Brethren whenever they had sustained any damage, and issued a public mandate for regulating the conduct of their subjects, with respect to the land appertaining to the settlement.

The physician in Serepta soon got many patients. Among these was a prince of the Derbet horde, who, during the winter of 1767, encamped with his whole retinue on the Brethren's land. On his removal, in the following spring, he invited two brethren, who had frequently visited him, to accompany the horde, promising them his friendship and protection, and every assistance in his power for learning the language. They readily accepted this proposal, and cheerfully submitted to all the inconveniences of this novel mode of life, living in tents and moving with the horde from place to place. Every one treated them with kindness, not excepting the priests, who permitted them to be present at their religious exercises, and raised no objections against their preaching the gospel to the Calmucs. However, as no benefit appeared to result from this scheme, the Brethren relinquished their wanderings with the horde, and confined their endeavours for their instruction in Christianity to frequent visits among those who resided in the neighbourhood, and to friendly conversations with them on religious subjects when they came into the settlement, which was the case almost daily. But, though the Calmucs listened with apparent pleasure to their discourse, the impression made upon their minds was fleeting and evanescent.

While the inhabitants of Sarepta were still concerting measures, and using every exertion which their limited means allowed, for the instruction of the Calmucs and other pagan nations in that part of Asia, an event occurred which threatened the entire destruction of the settlement. A very powerful party of insurgents, headed by the celebrated Pugatschef, which had for some time spread terror and devastation over several provinces of the Russian empire in the summer of 1771, overran the government of Astrachan, and took the town of Saratof. A small party of Russian soldiers, sent to oppose the rebels, was completely routed at Praleika, not more than sixty miles from Sarepta. Some fugitives brought the first intelligence of this to the settlement on the 28th August. The commandant of Czarizin at the same time informed our brethren that it was out of his power to protect Sarepta, and advised immediate flight as the only mode of safety left to the inhabitants. In consequence of this communication, all the sisters and children, and many of the brethren, fled that night in two parties, the one sailing down the river Wolga, and the other travelling by land. Both companies, after enduring many hardships and dangers, reached Astrachan in safety on the 7th of September. Sixty-five brethren still remained in the settlement, in order to secure their most valuable property, and to see what turn affairs would take. In the evening of September 1st, they received the dreadful intelligence of the approach of the rebels. As soon, therefore, as the sun was set, they likewise betook themselves to flight, and on the 9th arrived at Ianaitefka. There they received the joyful tidings of the discomfiture of the insurgents by Colonel Michelson, a few miles behind Sarepta. In a few days all the fugitives returned, filled with gratitude to God, that not an individual had lost his life or fallen into the hands of the enemy. Through the active benevolence of the Brethren's congregations in Europe, the damage done in the settlement, and the losses sustained by the inhabitants, were gradually repaired; and, by the divine blessing on their own industry, Sarepta soon resumed its former flourishing appearance.

Amidst their external prosperity, the inhabitants did not lose sight of what they had always considered the primary object of their establishment in this country, and to the furtherance of which they had repeatedly and solemnly pledged themselves: the propagation of the gospel among their heathen neighbours. The distresses and trials to which they had been exposed during the rebellion, and the divine protection and help they had experienced, rather tended to unite them more closely in brotherly love, and qualify them for renewed and zealous co-operation in the cause of God. For several years, however, their labours still continued unproductive. They embraced every opportunity for renewing their acquaintance with the Calmucs and other pagans; but as yet the gospel found no entrance among them. It, however, served to revive their hope, when a blind Calmuc girl, who was given to the Brethren and educated at Sarepta, gave pleasing evidence of true conversion, and received holy baptism on January 6th, 1781. A few years after she died in confident reliance on the atonement of Christ.

Their ever wakeful zeal to extend by every means in their power the kingdom of Christ, joined by repeated invitations to form settlements in Georgia and Grusinia, induced the brethren Godfrey Grabsch and George Gruhl, to undertake a journey to mount Caucasus. Prior to this, the former of them had resided some months in Astrachan, for the purpose of acquiring a competent knowledge of the Tartar language. To this city he and his companion repaired in November, 1781. On their arrival they waited on the governor, who readily furnished them with the requisite passports for their journey. Early in December they went to Kislar, where they were detained till the 28th February, 1782, waiting for a convenient opportunity to proceed. Passing through several Tartar villages, they reached Beregn on the 7th of March. The inhabitants being strict Mahomedans, the travellers found great difficulty in procuring a lodging, till at length a man, out of courtesy to their guide, opened his house to them for the night. They soon announced their arrival to Uzmei-Chan, the sovereign of that country, who happened to be in Beregn, and to whom they had letters of recommendation. At first they met with considerable opposition. Uzmei-Chan seemed unwilling to believe the account brother Grabsch gave of himself and his friend, and of the object of their journey; but being at length satisfied of its truth, he took them with him in his retinue, consisting of several Tartar princes, to his residence at Bashlu; and on the next day, being the 12th of March, sent them forward to Kubasha, providing them with a guide, to conduct them to his friend Mahmud. This man received them with great kindness, and allotted them an apartment in the fifth story of his house.

One principal object of this journey being to ascertain, as far as possible, whether the report, that the inhabitants of Kubasha were descendants of the ancient Bohemian Brethren, was supported by any credible historical evidence, brother

Grabsch lost no time in making the necessary inquiry. For this purpose he first examined all the public edifices. He discovered the ruins of three churches; and over the door of one of them discerned an inscription, but it was so effaced that nothing remained legible except the number 1215. At no great distance from these ruins stood a large stately church, built of hewn stone, and decorated with a profusion of architectural ornaments; but which had been converted into dwellings five stories high. Brother Grabsch was conducted to the top of this building, and several inscriptions were pointed out to him, but they were graphed in characters which bore no resemblance to those of any language with which he was acquainted. His next step was to visit every house, being about five hundred in number, and to inquire into the origin, religion, language and books of the inhabitants. This investigation led to the following results: "They now have no books written in the characters formerly in use among them; they use the Arabic in writing not only their own language, but also the Turkish and Tartar." In a conference with ten men, convened for that purpose, he received from Mahmud, who was the principal speaker, this additional information: "That their ancestors had been Christians, but upwards of three hundred years ago had adopted the religion of Mahomed, and now they thanked God that he had directed them into the right way to heaven; that they did not wish to hear any thing about the Christian faith, that they could never acknowledge him as a brother, till he turned Mahomedan, and that they hoped his view in coming to Kubasha, was not to reform them." Brother Grabsch having, in reply, stated his sentiments, they seemed rather affected, expressed their friendship for him, and Mahmud declared, that whenever he came to Kubasha, he would always treat him as his brother. "What!" said Grabsch, "though I do not turn Mussulman." "O, all that goes for nothing!" replied Mahmud.

March 17th, brother Grabsch and his companion were safely conducted back to Bashlu by Mahmud's servant, and the same day proceeded to Derbent, where they were hospitably entertained by an Armenian, to whom they had letters of recommendation from a friend in Kislar. Having received a passport from the governor, in the absence of the Chan, they set out on the 19th for Tiflis. But Hashi Bek, a man superior to the Chan in riches and influence, ordered them to be arrested and kept prisoners, till a quantity of silk, confiscated in the Russian territory, was restored. They were, however, permitted to walk about the town without molestation; and through the interposition of their friends in Kislar, they, at length, on the 18th of April, obtained their liberty: three days after they left Derbent, travelling with a caravan. As both the drivers and the inhabitants of the country through which they passed were Mahomedans, they found it extremely difficult to procure even a cup of cold water. Having crossed the river Samur, they continued their route in a south-easterly direction, between the Caspian Sea and a ridge of lofty mountains. Apprehensions of an attack from the Lesgians, who were returning from a warlike expedition and committing depredations wherever they came, obliged them to take a very circuitous road. In the town of Samachia, called Shirvan by the Persians, they received information, that in the neighbouring village of Wartaschin there was a congregation of Christians, the supposed descendants of a foreign people; and it was reported, that they came originally from Grusina, and belonged partly to the Grusinian, and partly to the Armenian church; and notwithstanding the compulsory means used by the Chan, to induce them to become Mahomedans, had persisted in their attachment to the Christian religion. Our brethren exceedingly regretted that they could not make it practicable to visit these people. During their stay in Shirvan, brother Grabsch found frequent opportunities for preaching Jesus, both to Armenians and Persians, who heard him with pleasure and attention. After a tedious and troublesome journey, they at length reached Tiflis on the 26th of June.

The day after their arrival, brother Grabsch waited on the Czar (emperor) Heraclius, to whom he had a recommendatory letter from the commandant of Kislar. The czar being absent, the brethren were, by order of Prince George, provided with a good lodging, and entertained at the czar's expense. Agreeably to his orders, they went in a few days to a park, about seven miles from the town, where he and his retinue were encamped. A separate tent was set up for brother Grabsch, who was soon after admitted to an audience; during which he was seated on a chair close by the czar, and served with tea and coffee, and during his whole stay in the camp, was treated with great kindness. The politeness of the czar went even so far, that, on receiving three boxes of the choicest apricots from Prince Chey Kusrue, he immediately sent one of the boxes to brother Grabsch.

July 6th the czar went to Tiflis to use the warm baths, and requested brother Grabsch to attend him. About midnight he sent for him, conversed with him on the object of his journey, and the doctrine and constitution of the Brethren's church, the commandant and prince Paul Andronickof being present. These two noblemen represented the advantages the Brethren would reap by forming a settlement in the czar's territory; intimating to Grabsch, that it was expected he would apply, in the name of his Brethren, for leave to settle in the country. Brother Grabsch replied, that he was not authorized to make any such request, but would convey any message, with which the czar might be pleased to honour him, to the bishops and elders of the Brethren's church. Upon this the czar rose from his seat, and stepping up to the missionary, thus addressed him: "Fedor Twanisch, (thus he was called by the Russians), I am informed that the Brethren are an upright and intelligent people; and if I could get five, ten, an hundred, or a thousand of them to settle in my country, I should give praise to God. That would indeed be a crown upon my head even in hoary age." He further declared, that he would himself write to the directors, grant the Brethren every privilege they could desire, and, if they found their residence in the country unpleasant, send them back at his own expense. In a second audience, he offered to send brother Grabsch and his companions home, by way of Constantinople, under a proper escort, that an answer might be the sooner obtained. They were, however, obliged to decline this offer. Before they left Tiflis, he gave them a letter written with his own hand, in the Turkish language, to the bishops and elders of the Brethren's church; and though they were under the necessity of declining his gracious offer, his esteem for them was not thereby lessened.

The czar was then sixty-four years old, and wore a long black beard: he had a venerable and mild countenance, and was noted, as much for his humanity as for his military prowess. His manner of life was very regular, spending most of his time either in transacting the business of the state, or in religious exercises; devoting but a few hours to sleep. He had six sons and seven daughters.

Tiflis lies in a valley, wholly encircled by mountains, and is watered by the river Kur, which flows through it. When the missionaries visited it, it contained about twelve thousand families, the major part of whom were Armenians, and only about one hundred families Mahomedans. It contained seven Armenian and five Grusinian churches, besides three mosques. The Grusinians, who are the proper inhabitants of the country, and of the Greek church, respected the Lutherans, but the Roman Catholics had rendered themselves odious by their zeal in making proselytes. After spending a month at Tiflis, the travellers found themselves compelled to relinquish their design of visiting the Tschegemzes, inhabiting the banks of the Tschegem, and supposed to be descended from the ancient Bohemian Brethren. From information received in Tiflis, however, it was pretty evident that this conjecture was unfounded. Having thus, as far as circumstances allowed, executed their commission, they left Tiflis on the 2d of August, being provided by the czar with an escort, and every thing necessary for their safety. Travelling by way of Mosdock, Achmet, Kislar and Astrachan, they arrived at Sarepta on the 16th of September, after an absence of ten months.

Two or three years prior to this journey, four brethren in Sarepta renewed the attempts made by others, who had since fallen asleep in Jesus, to convey the glad tidings of salvation to the Calmucs. As the first and most indispensable step for effecting this purpose, they devoted some hours every day to learn the language, and were joined in this by the Rev. C. Fred. Gregor, then minister of that congregation. The difficulties they had to encounter were neither few nor trifling. The only helps they could procure consisted in a very imperfect vocabulary, compiled by their predecessors; for the priests showed great unwillingness to give any of their sacred books into the hands of persons who did not esteem them of divine authority. Finding that they could make very little progress without a master, they engaged a gadsull (a priest of inferior rank), to be their instructor, who attended them some hours every day.

To proceed a step farther in their endeavours for introducing the gospel among the Calmucs, brother Neiz, who was the greatest proficient in the language, and likewise possessed some knowledge of medicine, offered to practise in this line among the Calmucs, under the direction of brother Wier, the physician of Sarepta, conceiving that this would be the likeliest way of cultivating an acquaintance with them. In order to carry this design into effect, a house was taken in the settlement, and provided with every requisite accommodation, to which the Calmucs might resort for medical advice and assistance. He soon obtained an extensive practice, which he faithfully improved, whenever a suitable opportunity offered, for directing their attention to the truths of the gospel, but apparently without any permanent benefit: for though they would sometimes remark, that the doctrines of the Bible were important sayings, they resisted the conviction by referring to their own fabulous mythology, which they pretended, not only bore a strong resemblance to the Christian system, but was superior to it.

Having hitherto found no entrance among the adult Calmucs, the brethren directed their attention to the children. In 1801, a Calmuc prince sent his son, called Makush, to Sarepta, for the purpose of learning the German language; and the following year several other children came to the settlement for the same purpose. With these, brother Valen Wendling commenced a school; and though he found it extremely difficult to fix their attention to any subject, yet a good impression appeared to be now and then made on their minds, while he interrogated them on the scripture lessons they were reading. Makush, in particular, gave occasional proofs of serious reflection, if not of an incipient work of the Spirit of God in his soul. Having learned a verse, treating of the necessity of faith, he remarked, "that he had prayed to our Saviour that he would give him faith, and the blessings connected with it: upon which one petition after another had occurred to his mind, so that he found it difficult to give over praying." Another time, after reading the history of our Saviour's temptations, he related, that feeling disposed to absent himself from divine service, he had recollected that this was a temptation of the devil, and prayed our Saviour to deliver him from it. "Now," added he, "I am glad I went to the preaching, and as the subject of temptations was introduced into the sermon, my pleasure was the greater, that I had not followed my own evil inclination." Being once asked whether he thought it was right to pray for our fellowmen, he replied: "I have often prayed that our Saviour would lead my mother and relations hither, that they might have an opportunity of hearing how they may be saved; or that he would send a messenger to them with this good news."

In 1808, the Brethren ransomed four girls of the Kirgese nation, between eleven and twelve years of age, and brought them to Sarepta. After a residence there of sixteen months, during which time they gave encouraging evidences of a work of the Spirit of God in their souls, they were at Easter, 1810, admitted to holy baptism.

Two years before the baptism of these girls the brethren were encouraged to take another and most important step towards the attainment of their ultimate object in settling in this country. The Rev. Dr. Steinkopff had addressed several queries to the minister of Sarepta, relative to the Calmucs, and the practicability of translating the Bible into their language, and circulating it among them; at the same time offering to the brethren, if they would undertake the work, the most liberal aid from the British and Foreign Bible Society. The queries having been answered to the satisfaction of this excellent institution, the committee placed a sum of money at the disposal of the brethren at Sarepta, for the purchase of a set of types in the Calmuc language, (the characters of which amount to one hundred and fifty-two,) and accompanied this grant with the promise of further aid, if the translators proceeded in their labours. Animated by the cheering prospect thus opened to them, for extending the knowledge of the Word of God among their numerous heathen neighbours, the brethren entered with zeal on the important work of translating the New Testament. Previous correspondence with the British and Foreign Bible Society, the casting of the types, and various other circumstances, for a time retarded the work, so that the manuscript of the gospel of St. Matthew could not be forwarded for printing to Moscow till in the year 1812.[*]

A translation of the Scriptures into the Calmuc language may justly be regarded as an object of great importance. According to the most authentic information, the Calmucs in the Steppe amount to upwards of sixty thousand souls. Beyond the limits of the Steppe, on the banks of the Wolga, there are about ten thousand of this tribe, who have nominally embraced Christianity, and belong to the Greek church. Besides these, sixty-five thousand families, speaking the Calmuc language, migrated from Russia, in 1791, and now live under the protection of China. The Calmucs are represented as constituting only one of the three tribes into which the nation of the Mongols is divided, who all employ nearly the same written language, and use the same alphabets. Hence it appears that, next to the Turkish, the Calmuc is the language most extensively spoken in Western and Eastern Tartary. And what promised greatly to promote the object of the Bible Society, and of our brethren in translating and circulating the sacred volume, is, that all the clergy and the higher orders of the Calmucs can read and write.

The desire of the brethren in Sarepta, to extend the knowledge of the Word of God, having received a fresh impulse by their engagements in translating the Bible, they once more directed their attention to the heathen in the neighbourhood; and being most generously assisted by a grant of three hundred pounds from the London Missionary Society, recommenced a regular mission among the Calmucs, directing their endeavours, in the first instance, to the Torgots horde, living at a greater distance from Sarepta than the Derbets.

Every preparatory arrangement having been completed, and the two brethren, J. Gottfried Schill and Christ. Huebner appointed for this service, they left Sarepta on the 20th of May, 1815. Their journey was long, and attended with great difficulties; some of which they could not have surmounted, if they had not been countenanced by the Russian government, and recommended by Prince Galitzin. After passing through several Cossack villages, they arrived on the 29th at the residence of the Calmuc prince, thirty-five versts from Astrachan. They were introduced to him in his kibitke, or tent, where he was sitting on a rough skin on the ground, bare-footed, clad in black horse-fur, and a black silk cap on his head. He ordered chairs for them, but they declined the honour of sitting in his presence. Several dishes of food were set before them, served upon white plates, with silver knives, forks and spoons, much in the European manner. On Sunday they breakfasted with him, and had much conversation. On another occasion they had an opportunity of witnessing the religious worship of the Calmucs; twenty gellongs, or priests, were seated in two rows, each having a small bell in his hand; they observed a variety of ceremonies during their prayers; and their dresses were made of rich silks and coloured stuffs. Afterwards the missionaries paid a visit to the Lama in his kibitke, who received them in a friendly manner, but spoke little. They were then introduced to another prince, who had lost the greater part of his subjects. He and others made many inquiries concerning the Christian religion, expressing their surprise at its being so widely spread. With the assistance of this prince, who had engaged to instruct them, they diligently applied themselves to the learning of the language, but found the acquisition of it a very difficult task.

Towards the latter end of July the horde broke up, and removed to another place, where there was plenty of grass; but which in other respects proved exceedingly uncomfortable, being very damp and unhealthy. "Here," say the missionaries, "we set up our kibitke, which was speedily filled with toads, frogs and other vermin, but we soon became accustomed to them. Provisions are very scarce and dear; milk and butter can scarcely be procured for money; our coffee is exhausted, and the water is hardly drinkable."[*]

A few extracts from their journals of 1816, shall conclude this chapter. The 22d of October they write: "On this and the following day the demand for the gospel of St. Matthew was so great, that we distributed thirty copies. What surprised us most was, that many, to whom we had formerly offered them in vain, now eagerly begged for them. This, as might be expected, excited the jealousy of the gellongs, and especially of an aged priest, who lives in the neighbourhood of Astrachan, and who is reputed very learned. He represented to the other gellongs or priests, that their craft would be endangered, if this book were generally read by the common people. The dread of incurring the displeasure of the gellongs, induced many to return their copies; but the alarm soon subsided, and in a few days numbers came, requesting to have the books back again. This, more than any thing, convinced us that they set some value upon the gospel, and gave us reason to hope, that it would not be read in vain by them. A young man who had received a copy, said, 'the gift of God is freely bestowed in this, for all may learn the way of salvation.' He then began to relate to all who were present, the contents of the gospel. We were astonished to find a Calmuc so well acquainted with the Word of God. The testimony he bore to the truth, in the presence of others, induced us to hope that the Lord would, ere long, open the hearts of this nation. It gives us pleasure to perceive, that they begin to be uneasy about themselves, and to inquire what they must do to be saved."*

[*] The brethren had previously translated detached parts both of the Old and New Testaments; but as they had no version of an entire Gospel, the work had, in fact, to be commenced afresh.

The Rev. Dr. Paterson, who transmitted the journal from which the preceding quotation is taken, adds in a letter of October 22d, 1817: "We have intelligence from our brethren of a much later date, from which it appears, that, notwithstanding the opposition of the gellongs, the demand for the gospel has been so great that not a copy of those we sent remains undisposed of, and we are now printing a new and much larger edition. The news from other hordes is equally interesting, and the demand for the gospel very urgent. The tract, drawn up by Mr. Schmidt, has been well received and read with avidity. We have heard of several instances of individuals, who have repeated it from beginning to end by heart. A letter lately received informs us, that one of the leading men in a horde, near Sarepta, died, professing his faith in Christ alone for salvation. Brother Loos, who was present at the time of his death, had his body decently interred, instead of leaving it to be devoured by the wild beasts, as is usual among them. Surely all these things are encouraging."

CONCLUDING OBSERVATIONS.

It would be foreign to the design of this work to enter into a detailed exposition of the Doctrine and Constitution of the Brethren's Church; yet a few notices on these subjects, as far as they affect the missions, will probably not be unacceptable to the reader.

With regard to the Doctrine, preached by the missionaries, little need be added to the information which the reader must have obtained by the perusal of the preceding sketches. Long experience has taught the Brethren, that the doctrine of Christ crucified is the power and wisdom of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. Without, therefore, first endeavouring to prepare the minds of the heathen for the reception of the gospel, by instructing them in natural religion, they at once declared unto them the record that God gave of his Son. This they have found, whenever received in faith, to be the most efficacious means of turning the gentiles from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God. Yet, there is no part of revealed truth, whether of doctrine or practice, which the missionaries do not endeavour to inculcate on the minds and hearts of their hearers and converts. In a word, their constant aim is, to humble the sinner, to exalt the Saviour, and promote holiness.

The internal regulations are the same in every mission. Besides preaching the gospel, the missionaries are diligently employed in visiting the heathen in their dwellings, or in receiving visits from them, for the purpose of discoursing with them, in a familiar manner, on spiritual subjects, or administering comfort, advice, or reproof, as the case may require. If any heathen are led to serious reflection, and desire their names to be put down for further instruction, they are called new people, and reckoned to the class of catechumens. If they remain steadfast in their resolution to forsake heathenism, and in their desire after baptism, they are considered as candidates for baptism; and, after previous instruction respecting this ordinance, are baptized. If their conduct afterwards proves that they have not received the grace of God in vain, they become candidates for the communion, and are admitted to be present as spectators at the celebration of the Lord's Supper; and finally become communicants. Those who have been baptized in infancy, and, on attaining to years of maturity, give satisfactory evidence of the sincerity of their faith, are first solemnly received as members of the congregation, and then admitted to the Lord's Supper. Separate meetings are held with each of these divisions. This is likewise done with other divisions of the congregation, with the children, the single men, the single women, the married people, the widowers and widows. These meetings, besides affording the missionaries an opportunity of instructing them, in a practical manner, in those precepts of the gospel which have a more immediate reference to their circumstances, and in exhorting them to make their calling and election sure, have a pleasing tendency to cement the bond of brotherly love, and maintain the spirit of unity among all the members of the congregation.

In most missions, especially when the number of converts is very large, assistants are chosen, consisting of persons of both sexes, whose good understanding and exemplary conduct have made them respected by the whole congregation. In the discharge of their duty they have particular districts assigned them, in which they visit the people from house to house, attend to the poor, the sick, and infirm, endeavour to remove dissensions, and promote harmony, &c. They are occasionally employed to hold meetings on week-days, and to preach in the out-places; but hitherto the brethren have not ordained any of the natives for the regular ministry of the gospel. The assistants, at stated times, meet the missionaries in conference, to report the state of their districts to them, and receive their counsel. Servants are also appointed to have the care of the chapel, and attend to every thing relating to external order. A council, consisting of a number of persons, chosen by the whole congregation, meets occasionally to confer on all subjects, involving the general welfare of the congregation, or settlement.

The external regulations cannot be the same in all the missions. Among free heathen, as in Greenland, North America, South Africa, &c. most of the converts live together in regular settlements; and thus various regulations, tending to promote, not only their progress in spiritual knowledge, but also their improvement in civilization, and their enjoyment of its comforts, can be introduced in these villages, which are rendered impracticable in missions among Negro slaves. In the latter case, little can be done in keeping school; but in all the settlements, this important method of instruction is attended to with great regularity. In all the missions, social worship is performed every day, in the morning or evening, and on Sundays the missionaries are employed, from morning till night, in preaching, meeting the different divisions of the congregation, and in attending to their converts, or heathen visiters.

Church discipline is exercised without respect of persons, for the Brethren justly consider that the breach of any moral precept is as criminal in a slave as in a free man, and that no situation, or prevalence of custom, can sanction a pretext for disobedience to the rule of Christ, as contained in the Bible. The discipline admits of different degrees, according to the nature of the offence, and consists, either in exclusion from the meetings of the baptized, or in suspension from the Lord's Supper, or in total separation from the church. In performing this duty the missionaries endeavour to act in the spirit of meekness, exercising all possible forbearance and patience, and they never proceed to a public exposure of the offender, while there is any reasonable hope that he will be brought to repentance and change of conduct, by remonstrance and private exhortation. Even when the offence has been of such a nature as to render exclusion necessary, they do not treat the lapsed person as an enemy, but entreat him as a brother, endeavouring to convince him, that the very exercise of discipline is an act of kindness, intended, by the grace of God, to preserve him from the fatal self-deception of being a Christian, merely because he has the name, and associates with believers, while he is living in known sin, and a stranger to true conversion of heart. The readmission of such a person, therefore, is not granted till he has given satisfactory proofs of true repentance.

The general superintendence of the missions is properly vested in the synods of the Brethren's church, which consist in representatives from all the congregations. But, as a synod is only convened occasionally, it is necessary to provide for the due administration of the Brethren's church during the interval. And for this purpose the synod, before its dissolution, nominates several bishops and elders to constitute a Board, called the Elder's Conference of the Unity, to have the general superintendence and direction of all the congregations, missions and other establishments of the Brethren's church. This Board is, by the synod, invested with the sole right of beginning, or suspending missions, and appointing missionaries. The Brethren's Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen, established in London, and similar societies formed in Holland and North America, act in subordination to the Elder's Conference of the Unity, whose sanction is requisite before any proposed measure for the beginning of a new mission, the appointment of missionaries, &c. can be carried into effect.

In the church of the Brethren the missionary service is, in the strictest sense, voluntary. No persuasions are used to induce any person to engage in it, who has not previously expressed, in a letter to the directors, his wish to be thus employed. After thus tendering his services, all the privations, difficulties and dangers, attending the life of a missionary, are fully and candidly represented to him. If, after maturely weighing all circumstances, his resolution remains fixed, he is considered as a candidate for the service; and in case he has expressed a predilection for any particular mission, or branch of the service, due attention is paid to his wishes. And after all, he is left at full liberty, either to accept or decline any proposal which may be made to him.

Besides the indispensable requisite of personal piety, and love for the service in which he engages, the qualifications deemed essential to a missionary of the Brethren's church, consists in a ready knowledge of the scriptures, and a good natural understanding, in some degree improved by education, combined with a kind and affable disposition, calculated to conciliate the affections of the heathen. No stress is laid on profound erudition. Long experience has taught the Brethren, that, in general, the habits of a student do not qualify a person for the laborious life of a missionary so well as those of a mechanic. Yet the superior talents of men of learning are justly appreciated, as having, in many instances, been of essential use, especially in those missions, where a new language was to be acquired, and translations of the holy scriptures were to be made.

The Brethren have no permanent fund for their missions. In the beginning Count Zinzendorf and his lady supported them almost entirely at their own expense; and even in subsequent years the count devoted nearly the whole of his property in undertaking, or aiding, measures for the diffusion of the gospel. Since the decease of the count and his lady the missions of the Brethren have been maintained wholly by voluntary contributions. Notwithstanding the utmost frugality is used, both by the directors and the missionaries, the annual expenditure is very considerable, having been greatly increased during the late war. Not only were all the expenses attending the equipment and voyages of missionaries, and the maintenance of the different settlements, more than doubled; but the disorganized and impoverished state of the continent of Europe occasioned a large diminution in the contributions of our brethren and friends from that quarter.

The preceding sketches supply ample proof of the self-denial, zeal, and diligence, with which the missionaries perform the important and arduous work in which they are engaged. Their duties are many and various. Besides the public ministry of the gospel and its ordinances, they are daily employed either in keeping school, and visiting their converts, or in attending to the temporal concerns of the settlement. In the former they are faithfully assisted by the sisters, as far as relates to their own sex, who also have the management of the domestic concerns. In every mission one of the brethren is generally chosen superintendent; yet he never acts without the concurrence of his fellow missionaries.

The number of missionaries, employed by the church of the Brethren at the close of 1817, amounted to eighty-six; and, including the sisters, one hundred and fifty-two persons were engaged in this service. They occupied thirty-four settlements, or stations, viz. three in Greenland, three in Labrador, three in North America, four in South America, seventeen in the West Indies, two in South Africa, where preparations were making for a third, and one station among the Calmucs in Tartary. About thirty thousand persons, formerly living in heathen ignorance and superstition, were then instructed in Christianity by the Brethren's missionaries; besides a great number of regular attendants on their public ministry, who had not yet made a decided profession of the gospel, or requested more special instruction.

To all, who from the heart long and pray for the extension of Christ's kingdom in the world, it must be a source of high gratification, and it calls for fervent thanksgivings to God, that he has preserved in the church of the Brethren the same zeal for the conversion of the heathen, which stimulated their first attempts, so that, notwithstanding all privations and difficulties, persons have never been wanting, who were ready to engage in the missionary service; and that the same spirit has, of late years, been poured out, in rich measure, upon many other Christian churches.

Above all, incessant praise is due to God, for the blessing from on high with which he has been pleased to crown the exertions of the various societies engaged in this glorious work. This is a sure presage, that, at the time decreed by unerring wisdom, he will verify his own word: "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Note.—A chapter of the above History, treating of South Africa, has been omitted, as a full account of the Brethren's operations in that quarter has been given in a late number of the Library. A few other chapters have been slightly abridged.—Ed. Ch. Lib.
